North Bristol Musical Society brought its season's work to a close on the 2nd ult., with a Conversazione, in the lesser Colston Hall. The High Sheriff having given a brief address on music, the members of the Society tastefully sang part-songs and selections. The former consisted of the "Song of the Hop-pickers" (Philp), "Of a' the airts" and "Ever True" (Hatton), "Song of the Homeland" (Sullivan), and "Isle of Beauty" (Whitmore); and the selections were the choruses "Wake with a smile," "O melancholy plight," "With a laugh as we go round," and the delightful trio, "The Hawthorn in the Glade," from Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen." Songs were contributed by Miss Amy G. Perry, Miss Maud Wilcocks, Mr. B. Shearman, and Mr. George Moon; and pianoforte solos were played by Miss Rose Thomas.

The fifth annual Concert of the Bristol South Musical Society, which took place on the 4th ult., was characterised by further advance in the efficiency of this young body, which sang with spirit and effect G. F. Root's cantata "The Pilgrim Fathers," Mr. E. T. Morgan conducting. The solos were entrusted to Miss P. Harris, Miss C. Mullen, Miss A. Tucker, and Miss A. Gerrard; Messrs. S. Tovey, A. E. Gough, F. J. Warren, F. W. Chappell, A. Hicks, T. Humpage, and F. Plucknett. Several part-songs were also included in the Concert scheme, and were sung with much artistic finish. Miss Bessie Morgan and Mr. Walklate played the accompaniments.

The Ballad Concert given on the 7th ult. at Colston Hall in aid of the Great Western Railway Employés' Benevolent Society was a great success.

At a Concert in aid of a local institution, given by the masters and scholars of the Bristol Cathedral School, on the 3rd ult., the choir creditably rendered a little cantata, "The Pic-nic" (J. R. Thomas); the school orchestra performed overtures and selections, and songs were sung by masters and friends.

The annual Concert given by the professors and students of the Bristol and Clifton Training School of Music, of which Mrs. Weaver is directress, took place on the 14th ult. The majority of the pieces in the scheme were for pianoforte, the works of Beethoven, Mozart, Handel, Liszt, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Grieg, Jensen, and a rising young composer, Nicolai von Wilm, being drawn from, showing that the training given embraces both the classical and romantic schools. The entire performance was very satisfactory.

At the third Popular Chamber Concert of the season, on March 31, Dvorák's Quartet in E flat (Op. 87) for pianoforte and strings, Rubinstein's Quartet for strings (Op. 17, No. 1), and Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 30) for pianoforte and violin were the chief works brought forward, the executants being Miss Lock, Messrs. Carrington, Bernard, Gardner, and E. Pavey. Mrs. Harold Bernard contributed songs, and Mr. J. H. Fulford was the accompanist. A large audience was present and cordially recognised the skill with which the compositions were performed.

The Clifton Amateur Operetta Society and the Clifton Amateur Orchestral Society were united, on the 13th and 14th ult., in performances of Gilbert and Sullivan's delightful nautical comic operetta "H.M.S. Pinafore." The representations took place in the Alexandra Hall, where the promoters of the entertainments were able to secure stage accessories, which greatly enhanced the efficient, spirited, and enjoyable portrayal of the piece. The characters were allotted to Miss Clare Vining, Miss Bramhall, Miss Lena Phillips, Messrs. D'Arcy de Ferrars, H. W. Pearson, J. C. Glyde, A. S. Tratman, W. A. Woodley, Dr. Lansdown, Dr. Dacre, and Master Graham. Mr. Leonard M. Day, who has had considerable experience in this particular kind of music, directed the performances, and Mr. E. Pavey was leader of the band.

The Bristol Society of Instrumentalists gave its sixth Concert on the 23rd ult., when a scheme of considerable interest was presented. Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" Overture, Haydn's Symphony in D (No. 5), Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, No. 2 (with the "Storm" section omitted), and three graceful Dances from Edward German's "Henry VIII." music were admirably performed under the direction of Mr. Riseley. Mr. T. Carrington was the solo violinist, and Miss Florence Cromey and Mr. Watkin Mills contributed songs.

Downend Choral Society gave two Concerts on the 9th ult., presenting morning and evening the same programme, consisting of Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," selections from the "Hymn of Praise," Henry Leslie's delightful part-song the "Lullaby of Life," Pearson's humorous glee "Three Doughtie Men," and Dr. Vincent's choral fantasia on national airs. All these were well sung under the direction of Mr. Harold Bernard, to whose guidance the marked advance made during the past two years by the Society is due. The soloists were Mrs. Harold Bernard, Miss Alice Coleman, Miss Harris, the Rev. A. J. Beedle, and Mr. Frank Hill. The band performed the Allegretto movement from the Symphony to the "Hymn of Praise," and a couple of other pieces. Mr. Harold Bernard's violin solo was a Romance of Ersfeld, and Mrs. Skelton and Miss Ethel Stephens were united in a duet for harps.

A performance of Handel's "Messiah" by the Midsomer Norton and District Choral Society took place on the 3rd ult., at Norton. The Oratorio had hitherto been considered too exacting for the young Society to undertake, but the late Mr. Beauchamp thought otherwise, and to induce the members to study the work made them each a present of a copy of the score. Although he was gratified to see Handel's masterpiece practised with a view to performance, he did not live to share in the enjoyment of its public representation, which was of such efficiency as to surprise everyone. Mr. Walter J. Kidner, who has drilled the Society throughout, conducted the performance. The choir of 120 sang with much precision, intelligence, and clear enunciation; in the more difficult choruses only was any marked wavering or weakness noticeable. The principal vocalists were Miss Florence Cromey, Miss Clara Aldersley, Messrs. C. Gregory, O. J. Hemmens, and H. J. Iles, who discharged their duties with commendable skill. The band, led by Mr. Harold Bernard, excellently played the Overture, Pastoral Symphony, and the accompaniments.

Weston-super-Mare Philharmonic Society displayed considerable boldness in performing Weber's "Der Freischütz" on the 12th ult. The choruses were given with crispness; the soloists were Madame Adelaide Mullen, Mrs. G. E. Alford, Mrs. Frampton, Messrs. H. Beaumont, Bennett, A. E. Masters, Montague Worlock, and Dr. Roxburgh. The band, led by Mr. F. S. Gardner, supported the voices judiciously, without overweighting them, and gave a faithful interpretation of the Overture.

The Pucklechurch and District Choral Society is to be commended on their performance of Barnett's "The Ancient Mariner" and Macfarren's "May Day," which was given, on the 12th ult., in the National Schoolroom, Marshfield. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Gillum, Fräulein Meder, Mrs. Trotman, Mr. Boyce Creak, and Mr. W. Thomas. Mr. Theo. Carrington was leader of the band, Miss Sibyl T. Trotman was the pianist, and the Rev. E. B. Bradley conducted.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

AFTER the death of Sir Robert Stewart and the interest taken in the national memorial in his honour, the visit of Sir Arthur Sullivan to Dublin, on the invitation of the Dublin Musical Society, to conduct a Concert of his own works, was the chief event on which all musical interest focussed during the past month. Much care and diligent rehearsal were bestowed on the selected works by the Society's able Conductor, Dr. Joseph Smith, and the result was a performance that not only called forth the encomiums of the musical public, but also the hearty commendation of the distinguished composer himself. The Concert, which was the third for the season, took place on the 9th ult. in the Grand Hall of the Royal University, which was crowded in every part. In memory of the late Sir Robert Stewart, the performance commenced with Mendelssohn's chorus "Happy and blest are they," which Dr. Smith conducted. Immediately on its conclusion Sir Arthur Sullivan came on the orchestra, and was received with loud plaudits from both audience and performers. Having acknowledged the ovation, he at once proceeded with the chief work on the programme, the sacred musical drama entitled "The Martyr of Antioch," composed by him for the Leeds Festival, 1880. It is so long since this composition was given in Dublin by the University Choral Society, under the direction of the late Sir Robert Stewart, that it came before the audience practically as a new work. From the very opening chorus it was at once manifest that both the work and its performance were alike worthy of close attention. The choir was on its mettle, and, liking its work, fairly eclipsed all its previous efforts. The band, which was both reduced and augmented for the occasion, was well-nigh an ideal one, so far as the accompaniments were concerned. In the unaccompanied funeral anthem, "Brother, thou art gone before us," the choir distinguished itself highly by its pure tone and by scrupulous attention to the Conductor's indications. The principal vocalists, specially engaged by the composer's wishes, were Miss Thudichum, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Andrew Black, who gave a delightful exposition of the solo music of Margarita, Julia, Olybius, and Callias respectively. The song of Fabius, "Brother, thou slumberest," was also undertaken by Mr. Black with fine effect. The second part commenced with Sullivan's Incidental Music to "Henry VIII.," of which the march and graceful dance were creditably played by the band; and King Henry's song, "Youth must needs have dalliance," sung by Mr. Black and chorus, was enthusiastically re-demanded and repeated. The duet "How sweet the moonlight sleeps," from the same composer's cantata "Kenilworth," was charmingly sung by Miss Thudichum and Mr. Lloyd; and after a capital performance of the part-song (unaccompanied) "O hush thee, my babie," the Concert was brought to a close by the Overture "Di Ballo," the composer again receiving a hearty round of applause, to which he replied by turning and vigorously applauding the orchestra and choir. Mr. Horan presided at the organ and Mr. Theodore Werner led the strings.

Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," with a miscellaneous second part, made up the programme of a successful Benefit Concert to Mr. R. V. O'Brien, which took place in the Antient Concert Rooms on the 5th ult., the Conductors being Mr. Brendan Rogers and Mr. Vincent O'Brien. The band and chorus numbered over 100 performers. In the second part the Overture to "Il Flauto Magico," the grand march from "Tannhäuser," and an operatic Overture by Mr. Vincent O'Brien were performed, the last-named number meeting with favourable acceptance. Mr. Werner was leader of the band.

On the 7th ult. a new operetta, entitled "Coquette," the joint work of Mr. R. E. Pattinson and Misses Sopworth and Pattinson, was produced at the Leinster Hall, under the direction of Signor Negroni, and achieved a considerable success. The singing of Miss Du Bedat, Miss Flood, Mr. Lowther Campbell, and Mr. Sidney Barrington, in the principal parts, was highly appreciated.

At the Chamber Music Recitals given in the Royal Dublin Society's Library, on the 9th and 16th ult., the programme consisted of Beethoven's Quartet for pianoforte and strings (Op. 16, No. 1), Rubinstein's Sonata-Duet for pianoforte and violoncello, and Schubert's posthumous String Quartet. The executants were Messrs. Papini, Esposito, Bast, Grisard, and Delaney.

The Leinster Section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians held its third and fourth sectional meetings at Merrion Row, on March 10 and the 14th ult. At the first of these Mr. Horan, sen., presided; and Mr. P. Goodman's Lecture on the Tonic Sol-fa system, illustrated by a children's choir, was received with great interest by a large and representative attendance of the principal members of the profession. Mr. J. Seymour's prize part-song, "The Bells of Shandon," obtained a first hearing. At the meeting of the 14th ult. the chair was taken by Dr. Joseph Smith, and a paper was read by the treasurer of the Section, Mr. Joseph Seymour, on the development of the Society's influence, which led to an animated debate. In honour of the memory of Sir Robert Stewart, Ecker's quartet, "At the grave of a musician," was sung. The Section numbers sixty-nine members.

Out of the numerous Ballad Concerts that took place during the past two months may be mentioned Dr. Collisson's Benefit Concert, on St. Patick's Day (March 17), and the Journalists' Fund Concert, on March 9, both of which were held in the Leinster Hall and were largely and fashionably attended.

Mr. Charles Marchant, Organist of St. Patrick's Cathedral, has been appointed Organist of Trinity College Chapel and Conductor of the Dublin University Choral Society, in succession to the late Sir Robert Stewart.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE second session of such an undertaking as the music classes at Edinburgh University is always a more critical period than the first, and Professor Niecks is to be congratulated on having attained such a measure of success in the courses of lectures which came to a close with the University session last month. There were four courses of lectures—on History; Theory (elementary Acoustics, Notation, Rhythm, Form, &c.); Harmony, Melody, Rhythm; and Advanced Harmony and Counterpoint. Sixty students in all attended these classes, and a very encouraging feature is that nearly two-thirds of these were continuing their studies of last session. Besides the regular classes, Professor Niecks organised six Historical Concerts illustrative of the development of dramatic music, which were very well attended by the public as well as by the students. Professor Niecks states that he is very satisfied with the work his students have done, and it seems to be quite possible that next year members of the highest class may be able to present themselves for examination with a view to graduation.

On the 2nd ult. the Amateur Orchestral Society gave a very good performance of Sterndale Bennett's Symphony in G minor. Other pieces in its programme were the "Magic Flute" Overture, Saint-Saëns's clever "Danse Macabre," and Lindpaintner's "Vampyr" Overture. A quartet of vocalists varied the programme with a few part-songs. There was, as usual, a very large audience.

On the 3rd ult. Mr. Kirkhope's Choir made its second appearance this season in a selection of madrigals and part-songs. Some of these were of the greatest beauty, others were more notable for their respectability, or the tradition of their interest. All were beautifully sung under Mr. Kirkhope's careful bâton. Wilbye's "Lady Oriana" and "Sweet honey-sucking bees" were the most successful of the older compositions; Sullivan's madrigal from the "Mikado" (which does not gain in daintiness or intelligibility when sung by a hundred instead of four voices), MacCunn's "There is a garden," and Stanford's "Corydon, arise," deserve mention among the more modern compositions. Mr. Santley was the soloist and was most warmly received. He was in good voice and, though hampered by a very inadequate accompaniment, he sang "O ruddier than the cherry" in beautiful style. "Thou art passing hence," "Son of the Ocean Isle," and "Anthea" were his other songs. M. Tivadar Nachèz was a very unsatisfactory violinist, his intonation being painfully at fault and his technique very slovenly. Alike in his choice and his performance of Handel's "Largo" as an encore, he gave further evidence of a want of sound artistic intention.

On March 31 Mr. James H. Peter gave a Pianoforte Recital, when he was assisted by Miss Henrica Van Senden, Mr. Herbert Thorndike, and Herr Willy Benda.

The same afternoon the Edinburgh Bach Society gave a reception to Mr. Henschel in the Masonic Hall, where the Society holds its meeting. Mr. Franklin Peterson, President, was in the chair, and there was a large attendance of members. The nucleus, it is hoped, of a Bach Choir has been formed, and it made its first appearance in the Motet "Jesu, priceless treasure." Messrs. Waddell and Colin McKenzie played the D minor Concerto for two violins, and Miss Lichtenstein the D minor Pianoforte Concerto. Mr. Henschel contributed the beautiful song "Vergiss mein nicht."

M. Siloti made his first appearance in Edinburgh before a somewhat small, but very kindly audience, in the Music Hall. Some Russian compositions were exquisitely played, but in Chopin's A flat Ballade the great pianist did not seem to be in his best vein, and a Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody proved worse than a disappointment in his hands.

Mr. Millar Craig's Choir (formerly known as Mr. Waddell's Choir) holds a very high place among kindred societies in Edinburgh for earnestness of artistic intent, and its performance of Bruch's "Odysseus," on the 11th ult., fully sustained its reputation. The choruses were exceptionally well sung, although the singers (like the composition itself) took too long to escape from the sustained gloom of the first part. Miss Gray (Penelope) and Mr. Galloway (Odysseus) divided the honours, the minor parts being in equally capable hands. A good audience filled the Queen Street Hall.

The two principal musical societies in Perth have given Concerts during the past month. The annual Concert of the Orchestral Society took place on March 22, and in its artistic aspect proved to be the best the Society has yet given. The pieces chosen, including Handel's "Occasional" Overture and a portion of a Haydn Symphony, were well within the powers of the players, and the precision and firmness of the strings in particular reflected much credit on the Conductor, Mr. J. W. Bryson. An important feature of the programme was the pianoforte playing of Herr Reinhold Tramm, a gentleman who should have a distinguished career before him. His pieces were a Chopin Barcarolle and a Fantasia by Liszt, which served to show his mastery over both expression and technical difficulty. The vocalist was Miss M. Finlay, whose appearance was deservedly appreciated.

On March 30 the Perth Musical Society gave a performance of "St. Paul," and grappled successfully with the difficulties of the work, although the balance of parts was not all that could be desired. Mr. Iver McKay sang the tenor solos in an artistic and finished manner, and the other principals were also efficient. Mr. F. S. Graves conducted, as usual.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Scottish Orchestra Company closed its season on the evening of the 7th ult., and amidst a perfect storm of applause, in recognition of the admirable work accomplished by Mr. Henschel and his band since the opening Concert in October last. Seldom, indeed, has any musical event hereabouts evoked such genuine enthusiasm. The popular Conductor was called again and again to the platform at the conclusion of the Concert, and while the audience were clamorous for a speech, Mr. Henschel contented himself with bowing his acknowledgments. The programme was laid out on lines which must have been thoroughly familiar to the great majority of the audience, and it need only be said that Beethoven's C minor Symphony was accorded a superb interpretation, as was also the selection from Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite. At the last classical Concert of the season, 2nd ult., another familiar bill of fare was submitted, none the less welcome as it contained Schubert's Symphony in C, the so-called "No. 10." Here again the masterly guiding-hand was in full evidence, every section of the orchestra responding to the Conductor's beat with rare artistic fidelity. Beethoven's Choral Symphony, given by the amalgamated forces of the Glasgow Choral Union and the band of the Scottish Orchestra Company on March 29, showed how well Mr. Henschel can also manage a body of choristers. His vocal material was in excellent order, the band appeared at its best, Misses Fillünger and Agnes Jansen and Messrs. Chilley and Price must be credited with some good solo work, and altogether the Beethoven Concert was a memorable event in a season which fairly lays claim to red-letter record. Here is a brief note of the work undertaken by the Scottish Orchestra during the period already indicated:—Fourteen classical and fourteen popular Orchestral Concerts in St. Andrew's Hall, three orchestral Concerts in the City Hall, nine classical and six popular Orchestral Concerts in Edinburgh, two Orchestral Concerts in Dundee, three in Greenock, three in Paisley, two in Ayr, two in Kilmarnock, one at Dumbarton, one at Helensburgh, and one at Newcastle. The band has also supplied accompaniments to choral works given in Edinburgh, Aberdeen, Montrose, Paisley, and Port Glasgow; and members of the orchestra have, moreover, assisted at fifteen Chamber Concerts in various Scotch towns. Altogether the band has appeared, in whole or in part, at sixty-seven Concerts, a record of singularly good omen as regards next season's operations.

The Paisley Choral Union had another successful Concert on March 28, when Mr. James Barr's well-trained choristers gave "Alexander's Feast" and selections from Gounod, Mozart, and Wagner. On the same evening Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were at the Queen's Rooms, Glasgow, in one of those charming Vocal Recitals which have won for the couple such enviable distinction. The programme was a model one, as can well be imagined, and comprised several gems of vocal writing, from the days of J. W. Franck to the present year of grace. On the 3rd ult. the Partick Choral Society gave a very good performance of Haydn's "Creation," while Wilford Morgan's cantata "Christian, the Pilgrim," was—the same night—heard in St. Matthew's Parish Church by the choir so ably conducted by Mr. Gideon Duncan.

At the Recital of sacred music in Sandyford Parish Church, on the 6th ult., Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God," formed the leading work in an otherwise well-constructed programme. The motet, in especial, was admirably sung, and Mr. W. J. Clapperton, who conducted, also gave a couple of organ solos.

A new comedy-opera, "Ali Khan, Prince of Persia," was produced in the Dixon Halls, Govanhill, on the 4th ult. The music is from the pen of Mr. J. Lindsay Mackay, a talented local composer, and Mr. Arthur King is responsible for the libretto. The work, if occasionally somewhat reminiscent, is bright and tuneful, and the five performances were attended by large and appreciative audiences.

The annual Smoking Concert given by the Glasgow Glee and Catch Club, on the 10th ult., was remarkable for the production of a couple of new glees. Those were Mr. Charles Wood's setting of the Shakespearian lines "The current, that with gentle murmur glides"—the prize composition—and Mr. Gerard F. Cobb's "Queen of the silent night." In both glees the writing is thoroughly English, and we can now quite well understand the high encomiums bestowed upon the various works submitted to the judgment of Sir Joseph Barnby and Dr. F. E. Gladstone. Each of the glees just-named is, indeed, an example of pure art. They were sung, moreover, with rare skill—an observation which also applies to almost every piece in an attractive programme, not forgetting the drolleries pertaining to Mr. A. W. Young's exhilarating arrangement of "The Massacre of Macpherson."

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Whatever opinions may exist as to the actual artistic value of the work done by the Philharmonic Society during the season just brought to a close, only one verdict can be placed on record as to the final Concert given on the 3rd ult. In the case of Sir Charles Hallé, his dealing with all that may be classed as the larger aspect of music in relation to the orchestra is a veritable labour of love, and no matter whether the subject taken in hand be "Parsifal," "Tannhäuser," "Die Meistersinger," or the "Walkürenritt"—and what more comprehensive samples of the genius of Richard Wagner could be selected!—the veteran Conductor has rarely been seen so thoroughly in his element. The band, augmented to a hundred strong, was from first to last in touch with its chief, and a programme of the grandest proportions was carried through in a thoroughly worthy manner. The chorus had but little to do, and this is to be regretted; but admirable vocal selections were rendered by Mr. Edward Lloyd.

Wagner was to the front also on the 12th ult., in Birkenhead, when the premier Society—the St. Cecilia—gave, under Mr. Appleyard, an important selection from this composer's "Tannhäuser," together with Mozart's "Requiem." The entire performance was good vocally, but though every effect possible was made of clavier instruments, there was naturally a lack of that orchestral colour which forms so essential a condition of a fitting rendering in the case of both works named. At Garston the local technical committee has spent a portion of the money placed at its disposal in the formation of singing classes, divided into junior and senior divisions—under Mr. Wright and Mr. Argent respectively—and the members of the latter gave, as a sample of the work they had done during the season, a performance of Mendelssohn's "Athalie" on the 3rd ult. The music, it was stated, had been absolutely read by the class in question without more than mere verbal guidance from the Conductor, and had, in fact, formed a supplementary study to the blackboard tasks of each evening. An orchestra was employed at the performance.

The Liverpool Orchestral Society gave a Ladies' Concert in the Philharmonic Hall, on the 7th ult., with Dvorák's Symphony in G (No. 4) as the leading feature. The band, a hundred strong, under Mr. A. E. Rodewald, has never been heard to greater advantage, and has come to be recognised as one of the most important factors in our local world of art. Mr. Goossens' second experiment in regard to orchestral concerts was not so great a success from a financial point of view as it deserved to be. The Symphony was Beethoven (No. 5) in C minor, which was excellently played.

The only other important event of the past month has been the fifteenth annual gathering of the Welsh choirs of the city and district, numbering in the aggregate about 1,500 voices. The programme comprised a selection of the hymn tunes so dear to the Cymric race, as well as some Welsh anthems, one of which was the composition of Mr. D. Jenkins, the Conductor of the meeting.

On the 5th ult. Pattison's "Ancient Mariner" was given by the Customs Vocal Union, conducted by Mr. G. J. Wood.

At Chester the Musical Society, under Dr. J. C. Bridge, gave, on the 9th ult., Walthew's "Pied Piper"; and the Cestrian Orchestral Society, under Mr. Hughes, has also been worthily in evidence. The organ in the Cathedral has been recently overhauled by Messrs. Gray and Davison and greatly improved in the process. The small instrument by the same firm, which did temporary duty in the historic pile of St. Werburg, has been purchased by the monks of Grosvenor Street Catholic Church. At Eaton Hall, late in March, was held the annual gathering of the village choirs of Aldford, Pulford, Saighton, Eccleston and Eaton itself. Birch's "Merry Men of Sherwood" was given, under Mr. Shrubsole, by about 140 choristers and an orchestra of twenty-five performers.

The annual proclamation of scholarships and other awards granted to students of the Liverpool Music School took place in the Theatre of Victoria University College on the 12th ult. The Music School has now obtained definite civic recognition, and its articles of association having been amended to meet the case, it receives a grant from the technical committee of the City Corporation. The Lord Mayor of Liverpool and Mayor of Birkenhead were officially present, and so also was Vice-Chancellor Rendall. The latter, in alluding to the coalition of the Manchester branch of Victoria University with the new Royal College of Music in that city, shadowed forth a desire that something of the sort might be brought to pass in regard to the sister college in Liverpool and the Music School recently founded here.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The music of the Concert-room has now so entirely given place to the song of the thrush that, during the last month, there has been extremely little to record which the readers of The Musical Times would care to have described.

To the annual Conversazione with which the Gentlemen's Concerts close their season rather more than ordinary interest attached this year. The music was pleasant; and, if not of the highest order, it served to relieve and enliven the flow of conversation. The Carl Rosa Company has been fairly well patronised during a six weeks' stay here, the novelties proving specially attractive. Wagner's early work, constructed on the artificial Meyerbeer model, was admirably mounted, and its pompous—but, like that of the "Flying Dutchman," too blatant—instrumentation gave life to the earlier scenes of "Rienzi"; but the extreme formality of the long-continued march-rhythms became wearisome. Naturally, in this city, the presentation on the stage of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" drew crowds which must have proved remunerative to the exchequer. The popularity of the work is unquestionable, as are many of its novel effects and its masterly orchestration. Each night the audience assembled fully prepared to enjoy, and possessed of that qualification said to be necessary to an Englishman's cordial appreciation—some familiarity with the story told and with the manner of its relation. But the final verdict must be perplexing to those who extol the stage at the expense of the platform, and so readily accept the Wagnerian creed as to the necessity for combining all possible accessories before full enjoyment of a dramatic work may be reached. I have always held that it must, indeed, be poor music which needs the help of action and spectacle ere the fancy may be aroused to the right pitch; and most of those who have made themselves conversant with the score of "Faust," and familiar with it in the Concert-room, will own that the mind is thwarted, rather than aided, by the attempt to depict to the eye that which demands such a free play of the imagination as music alone can give. The falling off in the power of the composer in the last scenes and the weakness of the scoring—so strange in so consummate a master of orchestration—could not fail to be felt so soon as the ear was fettered by an attempt to render visible the ride to Pandemonium; but in no part of the work was the visible representation a help, except, perhaps, to a slight extent in the March.

A retrospection of the whole season now closed brings some disappointment. The winter could not be said to have brought with it any great gain to the Art-world; let us hope that, pecuniarily, it may have been encouraging to the really deserving. We certainly have been musically favoured by the visits of pianists of high attainment; so much so as to lead one to fear that the market may be rather overstocked, and that many capable artists must suffer from inadequate reward. But we await the coming of the great singers who may revive the glories of old days when vocalists, like instrumentalists, were content to work hard and unremittingly ere they challenged the approval of the public. Declamation may be all very well occasionally; but when the merciful critic cannot discover any other point upon which to hang praise, it is clear that something is wrong, and that the art of vocalisation is degraded; somewhat as the organ is by the young amateur who delights to amuse the thoughtless by the cachinnation of his vox humana stop.

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

At the last Drawing-Room Concert of the season, held on the 5th ult., Sir Charles and Lady Hallé, Mr. Whitehouse, and Mr. Speelman were the artists. The programme, which commenced with Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 47), also included solos for Lady Hallé, Sir Charles Hallé, and Mr. Whitehouse, and concluded with Handel's Sonata in D for violin and pianoforte, finely played by Sir Charles and Lady Hallé. We are glad to note the ample and steady support these Concerts receive from a large body of subscribers.

The Nottingham Amateur Operatic Society occupied the Theatre Royal for six nights, commencing on the 9th ult., performing Gilbert and Cellier's Opera "The Mountebanks" to overflowing houses. Its success was well deserved, for patient study developed a result that would have been creditable to a professional company. The Conductor, Mr. Ralph Horner, who rehearsed the opera, must be congratulated on the general excellence of the performance, for to his skill and perseverance must be attributed much of the success.

Under the management of Mr. Charles Foulds, M. Paderewski gave a Pianoforte Recital at the Albert Hall on the 16th ult. The house was crowded in every part, and the virtuoso must have been gratified by his enthusiastic reception and the attention given to a long programme, in which Chopin's works largely predominated. This Concert practically closes the season here, which has been unusually crowded with all sorts of ventures, of which we fear very few have been profitable.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

The Newcastle-under-Lyme St. George's Choral Society performed Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," on the 5th ult., in the Municipal Hall. The principals engaged were Miss Ada Lee, Mrs. Johnson, Mr. S. Mason, and Mr. F. Owens. The chorus numbers eighty voices, and the addition of only pianoforte and harmonium accompaniments detracted from their vocal efforts. Mr. G. Lawson presided at the pianoforte and Mr. Josef Cantor at the harmonium. Mr. Mason acted as Conductor.

Mr. R. Emery secured Mr. Santley, Miss Emilie Lloyd, Miss Nellie Gosnell, Mr. Hamlyn Crimp, Mr. Ffrench Davies (harp), and Mr. Gaggs (violin) for his Annual Concert at the Victoria Hall, Hanley, on behalf of the Roman Catholic Church, on the 5th ult.

The second Annual Musical Festival of the Burslem Sunday School Union was held at the Town Hall, on the 5th ult., and a large choir sang an admirable selection of part-songs, including the stirring "Comrade's Song of Hope." Mr. H. T. Wardle presided at the organ, Mr. F. A. Wardle at the pianoforte, and Mr. J. A. McGregor conducted. The programme was varied by the inclusion of vocal solos, rendered with pleasing expression by Misses Jackson and Thorley and Messrs. Cartledge and Wood.

The re-organised Longton Choral Society gave a selection of choruses from the great composers before a crowded audience at the Town Hall. During the interval the Secretary (Mr. H. W. Wright) was presented with a handsomely bound copy of the "Creation" as a token of esteem from the members.

The Florence Board School (Longton) performed the new dramatic cantata entitled "Wallace; or, the Knight of Ellerslie," on the 12th and 13th ult. Mr. W. Hollingshead acted as Conductor with considerable success.

From a financial aspect the recent performances of the Stoke Philharmonic Society have had a somewhat depressing effect upon the officers, and early this season it was decided to make an appeal to the music-lovers of the district under the more cosmopolitan title of "North Staffordshire," with their talented Conductor's (Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap) dramatic cantata "Fair Rosamond." The response to the appeal was very gratifying, and a band and chorus of 350 performers, under the direction of the composer, gave an admirable representation in the Victoria Hall, Hanley, on the 12th ult. Miss Medora Henson, Miss Mary Reeve, Mr. Iver McKay, Mr. Frank Johnson, and Mr. Tom Cranmer were the principals. Mr. J. A. Rees led the orchestra (chiefly drawn from Birmingham), and Mr. W. Sherratt ably presided at the grand organ. Mr. Iver McKay won unstinted praise as Henry II., and the other artists also deserve commendation. The augmented chorus sang with magnificent effect in the full and elaborate chorus music, the male portion being very prominent in the "Veni Creator Spiritus." Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap was enthusiastically cheered at the conclusion. In memory of the late Honorary Secretary, Dr. J. G. U. West, the band played the "Dead March" from "Saul" at the close of the Concert.

Madame Antoinette Sterling visited the Victoria Hall on the 16th ult., and sang "The Lost Chord." A numerous concert-party also assisted under Messrs. Atkinson's direction.

The final Concert for this season by the Burslem Tonic Sol-fa Choir was given in the Town Hall on the 19th ult. Barnby's "Rebekah" and Macfarren's "May Day" were the works performed, and the choir gave evidence of excellent training. Mr. Sherratt conducted.

The Hanley Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. T. Turnock, gave a miscellaneous Concert at the Central Lyric Hall on the 30th ult.

The shareholders of the Tonic Sol-fa College, resident in this district, met at Hanley and elected the Board for Examinations as follows:—Chairman: Mr. T. Turnock (Hanley); Vice-Chairman, Mr. J. A. McGregor (Burslem); Secretary, Mr. C. Oliver (Bucknall); Executive, Messrs. Garner, F. J. Stone, Haynes, Jeffries, W. H. Boote, J. Frost, and W. E. Wood.

MUSIC IN WILTS AND HANTS.

Elaborate preparations are being made in Salisbury for the forthcoming Choral Festival, which is to take place in the Cathedral on the 10th inst. Considerably over 2,000 singers are expected to attend, and, in addition to Dr. Lloyd's Service and Dr. Parry's anthem, both of which have been written for this Festival, a short selection from "The Redemption" will be sung. The organ will be supplemented on the occasion by the band of the Royal Marines. The performance of "The Messiah," on the 5th ult., by the Sarum Choral Society, was a complete success, and the Committee may be congratulated upon the result of its efforts to place this old-established Society upon an improved basis. Handel's Oratorio was a popular selection, and there was a crowded attendance. The principal vocalists were Miss Minnie Robinson, Miss Edith Hands, Mr. H. Lewis Thomas, and Mr. Walters, all of whom sang admirably. The chorus, considerably increased in strength, did its work with commendable earnestness and enthusiasm, one or two of the choral numbers being given with really fine effect. An unusually good orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. W. Richardson, rendered valuable assistance, and the recitatives were accompanied on the organ by Mr. W. Bowey. A special word of praise is due to Mr. F. L. Bartlett, the newly-appointed Conductor, to whose care and skill much of the success of the Concert was due. Mr. T. E. Spinney gave his annual pupils' Concert on the 10th ult., when there was a large attendance. The various efforts, vocal and instrumental, of the pupils were well received, and spoke well for the training they receive. Variety was given to the programme by some unaccompanied part-singing by the Salisbury Orpheus Society, of which Mr. Spinney is the Conductor.

The joint forces of the Marlborough Choral Society and the Swindon Choral Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" in the Corn Exchange, Marlborough, on the 3rd ult. There was a chorus of 130 voices, and the orchestra, numbering twenty, was supplemented by organ and pianoforte, at which Mr. G. Whitehead and Miss A. Greenland respectively presided. The solos were effectively sung by Madame Jessie Strathearn, Mrs. Graham Coles, Mr. Sidwell Jones, and Mr. Egbert Roberts, and the choruses given in a manner which reflected much credit on Mr. W. S. Bambridge, the Conductor. On the 5th ult. the Marlborough College Orchestral Society made its annual public appearance in the Upper Schoolroom of the College. Mr. Robert Berndt, with his band of more than sixty performers, supplied an interesting programme, which included Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture, the Ballet music from Massenet's "Le Cid," and the March from "Tannhäuser." To the whole of the music full justice was done, and the results of Mr. Berndt's excellent work at the College were evident throughout. Songs by Mozart, Goring Thomas, and Tosti were sung by Miss Ena Bedford.

The Westbury Philharmonic Society, under the conductorship of Mr. A. Foley, gave a successful Concert in the Laverton Hall, on the 3rd ult., before a large audience. The programme consisted of Berthold Tours's "Festival Ode" and a miscellaneous selection. The chorus and orchestra showed evidence of very careful training, and the Society was assisted by Miss Agnese Rose, Miss Jessie V. Mitchell, Miss Ina Ashley Dodd, the Rev. H. A. Hickin, and Mr. Arthur Millington. The band was led by Mr. E. Jones.

A Concert in aid of the Upton Scudamore Church choir was given in the Athenæum Hall, Warminster, on the 5th ult. A feature of the Concert was some good glee-singing by the Rev. W. O. M. Hughes, the Rev. A. H. St. Pattrick, Mr. W. Anstice, Rev. A. T. Powley, and the Rev. T. M. Everett. Songs were sung by Miss Mary Jones, and Mr. A. Foley played some excellent violin solos. The Rev. H. A. Hickin acted as accompanist.

The second Concert of the seventeenth season of the Trowbridge Musical Union took place on the 10th ult., when Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" was performed by a band and chorus of a hundred performers. The soloists were Miss Ethel Winn, Miss F. Evans, Mr. J. Bright Jones, and Mr. C. E. Poole. Mr. Ten Brink led the orchestra, and Mr. H. Millington conducted.

The Southampton Philharmonic Society made its last appearance this season on the 17th ult. The occasion was one of considerable interest in musical circles, as Sir Joseph Barnby was announced to conduct his cantata "Rebekah," which had been selected as the chief work to be performed. The band and chorus numbered 150, and at the conclusion of the rehearsal Sir Joseph congratulated them upon their efficiency and the intelligent way in which they had prepared his music. The solos in the cantata were sung by Miss Gertrude Ward, Mr. Frederick Williams, and Mr. William Paull. The second part of the Concert included glees and orchestral works conducted by Mr. H. M. Pike. At the Hartley Hall, on the 11th ult., a Concert was given by the Southampton Amateur Orchestral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. E. Moon. The Society, mustering fifty members, gave a good account of itself, being particularly successful in the Three Dances from Edward German's incidental music to "Henry VIII." Miss Gertrude Shearer and Mr. Samuel Masters were the vocalists, and Miss Alice Ivimey and Mr. F. Ivimey were at the pianoforte. Sir John Stainer's "Crucifixion" was sung in St. Mary's Church, Southampton, on the evening of the 11th ult. Mr. F. Noyes, of Salisbury Cathedral, and Mr. Norman Kendal, of Exeter Cathedral, both formerly of St. Mary's choir, sang the solos, and Mr. R. Sharpe presided at the organ.

The third Concert of the Romsey Musical Society took place on the 4th ult., when the principal work performed was Gaul's sacred cantata "Ruth." The solo vocalists were Mrs. Barrington Gore Browne, Mrs. Lyon, Miss Ida Browne, and Mr. Sidney Kendall, all of whom were successful. The choruses were sung in a manner which reflected credit upon the Conductor, Mr. Moss. There was a small orchestra of strings, and Mr. Carey Bliss gave valuable assistance at the organ.

The members of the Christchurch Choral Society gave an excellent performance of the "Elijah" in the Town Hall, Christchurch, on the 4th ult. Mr. Walter Jenkins conducted the chorus and orchestra of eighty performers, and Miss Elsie Mackenzie, Miss Amy Weldon, Mr. A. W. Russe, and Mr. Arthur Appleby were the principal vocalists.

A new cantata, entitled "Horsa," the composition of Mr. W. H. Liddle, and Mr. A. D. Arnott's new Ballad for chorus and orchestra, "Young Lochinvar," were the chief features of an interesting Concert given by the Basingstoke Harmonic Society on the 17th ult. Miss Pattie Hughes, Mr. J. W. Page, and Mr. W. H. Coltart were the principal vocalists, and the band was led by Mr. J. S. Liddle, who also played some excellent violin solos. The pianoforte accompaniments were played by Miss M. U. Awkwright. Both works mentioned were conducted by their respective composers, and received with marked favour by a large audience.

The band of the Royal Artillery, under the conductorship of Mr. Zavertal, gave an admirable Concert at the Town Hall, Portsmouth, on the 20th ult. The programme included Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture, Berlioz's March "Hongroise," and Goldmark's symphony "Rural Wedding."

An excellent performance of Sullivan's "Golden Legend" was given on March 28, under the conductorship of Mr. Howard May, at the Hotel Mont Dore, Bournemouth The chorus and orchestra, the latter led by Mr. C. Fletcher, and ably assisted by the band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry, numbered upwards of 300 executants; and the principal vocalists were Madame Newling, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Braxton Smith, and Mr. M. Warlock. The programme also included a cleverly written and very effective choral work, entitled "Ave Cæsar! Morituri te salutant," by Mr. George Miller, by whom it was conducted, and Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Benedictus."

The Havant and Emsworth Choral Society gave its seventeenth Concert, on the 9th ult., in the Havant Town Hall. The programme included the first part of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and the Overtures to "Fidelio" and "Masaniello." The principal vocalists were Mrs. H. D. Lovegrove, Mr. C. Hunnybun, and Mr. G. Fielder. Mr. W. E. Churcher led a capable orchestra, and Mr. W. Packham conducted.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

With Easter the musical season practically comes to an end, but a few belated Concerts remain to be chronicled. The Leeds String Quartet party gave the last of their Concerts on March 21, the programme including Beethoven's E minor Quartet, the second of the "Rasoumowsky" set, and Schumann's Quartet in A (Op. 41, No. 3), which were played with correct expression and a generally satisfactory ensemble by Messrs. Müller, Haigh, Gutfield, and Giessing. The vocalist was Miss Louisa Watson. It is to be regretted that these unpretending but most interesting Concerts have met with such poor support that they will not be continued. Among the 400,000 that dwell in Leeds it seems there are not found 300 musically righteous, at least to the extent of caring for string quartets. On March 29 the York Musical Union gave a Concert of violin and pianoforte music. Dr. Alan Gray's fine Sonata in G was artistically played by Messrs. Willy Hess and Leonard Borwick, and was received very warmly, the composer being called forward to receive the congratulations of the audience. Mr. Borwick's remarkable power as an interpreter of Brahms was shown in his masterly performance of the Romance in F (Op. 118) by that composer. Mr. Hess played solos by Beethoven, Spohr, Laub, and David, and both artists were heard in Schumann's Sonata in A minor (Op. 105). The York Musical Society gave "Elijah" on the 3rd ult. Mr. Ffrangcon Davies's refined and artistic assumption of the title-rôle was one of the most striking features of a generally excellent performance. Miss Florence Bethell, Miss Jessie King, and Mr. William Green were thoroughly satisfactory in the other solo parts, and the marked improvement in the chorus reflected great credit on the pains taken over them by Dr. Naylor, the able and conscientious Conductor of the Society. The band, too, though it included several amateurs, proved equal to its task. A highly interesting Concert was given by the Middlesbrough Musical Union on the 4th ult. Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride" occupied one half of the programme. Miss Evangeline Florence and Mr. Iver McKay sang the soprano and tenor solo parts with considerable dramatic force, the lady displaying in addition refinement and depth of feeling. Mr. Lucas Williams was slightly overweighted in the baritone part. The chorus-singing was characterised by spirit and decision, the tenors being remarkable for their exceptionally good quality, and the orchestra was efficient, if somewhat heavy in the more delicate parts. The principal feature of the miscellaneous part of the programme was a performance of three movements of Beethoven's Septet, substituted at very short notice for a Pianoforte Concerto, in which Miss Louie Heath was to have been the soloist, but was prevented by illness. Mr. N. Kilburn conducted with marked ability and discretion. The Ripon Choral Society's second Concert took place on the 5th ult., the Twelfth Mass (attributed to Mozart) being the chief composition in the programme. The principals were Miss Summersgill, Miss Marie Rhodes, Messrs. T. Child and J. Browning; Mr. W. Squire, of Leeds, being the Conductor. Spohr's Quartet and Chorus "Blest are the Departed" was sung in memory of the Society's recently deceased Conductor, Mr. W. H. Bentley. On the same evening a Recital of pianoforte and vocal music was given at Bradford by Mr. and Mrs. Edward Haley. The lady's powers as a pianist were shown in the so-called "Moonlight" Sonata and pieces by Schumann and Chopin, and Mr. Haley sang a series of songs by Schubert, Schumann, Franck, and other more recent composers with good expression. On the 6th ult. Mr. Chevalier sang coster songs to a large audience at Leeds. The entertainment does not call for criticism in a musical paper, its interest not being musical, but purely histrionic. From this point of view, however, it deserves high praise. The Wakefield Choral Society's programme on the 6th ult. consisted of "Elijah." The principals were all local artists, Miss Ada Lee, Miss Watson, Mr. C. Blagbro, and Mr. Dan Billington; the Conductor was Mr. J. Naylor Hardy. A Concert given on the 7th ult. by the pupils of the Hull School of Music evidenced the ability of their teacher, Miss Sharrah. The local critic, waxing eloquent over their performance, attributes the "magnificent rendering" by a young lady-pianist to "the evident discipline in touch and moderation in cadence which she has acquired under her recent tuition." No wonder "the audience seemed almost spellbound." On the 17th ult. the Armley Choral Society, of which Mr. W. H. Harrison is Conductor, gave a performance of Haydn's "Creation." The principals were Miss Beecroft, Mr. T. Child, and Mr. Lightowler. The Hornsea Choral Society, under the Conductorship of Mr. G. H. Smith, gave Mr. Cowen's cantata "The Rose Maiden," on the 19th ult. Miss Ethel Holmes, Miss Jennie Langford, and Messrs. G. A. Eadon and Cattley were the principal vocalists, and Mr. J. W. Brodie accompanied.

The Hull Harmonic Society gave "Judas Maccabæus" on the 19th ult. Mr. Walter Porter the honorary Conductor of the Society, directed a generally satisfactory performance. The principal vocalists were Mrs. James Wilson, Mrs. Upton, Mr. S. Thornborough, and Mr. J. Hall, of whom the first and last-named deserve special praise. The chorus, save for some slight occasional unsteadiness, did its work well.

Mr. E. P. Reynolds gave a Subscription Chamber Concert, on the 6th ult., in the Cutlers' Hall, Sheffield. The disaster, which, in consequence of commercial depression, has attended nearly all local musical enterprises this season, had been avoided by Mr. Reynolds, who wisely discontinued his regular series and waited until performances became less frequent before arranging for his only Concert. The most interesting piece on the programme was Dvorák's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 87), performed for the first time in Sheffield. The complex and beautiful work was played in superb fashion by Messrs. Willy Hess, Speelman, Thorpe, and Reynolds. Pleasing contrast was obtained by the inclusion in the programme of a Sonata for violin and viola, with pianoforte accompaniment, by J. M. Leclair. Beethoven's String Trio in G major (Op. 9, No. 1) was finely played by Messrs. Hess, Speelman, and Thorpe. Solos by all the instrumentalists, and songs by Miss Sylvia Wardell, completed an attractive programme. Mr. J. A. Rodgers accompanied.

The Alfreton Choral Union gave an admirable performance of Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" in the Town Hall, on the 10th ult. Mr. W. G. Taylor conducted. On the same night the same work was performed at Denaby, in South Yorkshire. Denaby is in the heart of the coal district, where, in spite of unfavourable surroundings, choral music is assiduously cultivated by the miners and has reached a high pitch of excellence. At the Concert under notice, the chorus-singing was marked by accuracy, vigour, and very fair tone, and the performance reflected credit on Mr. Moses Soar, who conducted.

The Heanor Choral Union, a flourishing Notts organisation, gave a successful performance of "Acis and Galatea" in the Town Hall, Heanor, on the 12th ult. Under Mr. W. G. Taylor, who conducted, the chorus won the chief honours. In all respects, however, the rendering of the work was admirable.

On the 15th ult. Mr. Charles Harvey gave a Ballad Concert at Rotherham, the Concert-party including Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Kate Cove, Miss Louise Nanney, Mr. Alex. Tucker, Mr. Trefelyn David, and Mr. Bisaccia.

On the 16th ult. the Sheffield Collegiate Orchestral Society gave the closing Concert of the season in the Music Hall, under the direction of Mr. S. Suckley. An accurate and finished performance of Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony gave evidence of careful rehearsal. Godard's "Scènes Poétiques," and Overtures by Hérold and Suppé were also admirably played. Madame Vadini and Mr. J. E. H. Drabble were the vocalists.

The Upperthorpe Musical Society performed "Acis and Galatea" in the Music Hall, on the 17th ult., with considerable success. Under Mr. J. Beaumont the singing of the Society steadily improves, and the more trying numbers of Handel's melodious serenata served to display the many good qualities of the chorus. The programme also included Liszt's Concerto in E flat, excellently played by Mr. F. Beaumont.

On the 24th ult. the Sheffield Choral Union performed Haydn's "Seasons" in the Music Hall. The principals were Miss Sylvester, Mr. A. Bayles, and Mr. J. Lycett. Mr. S. Suckley conducted.

The Sheffield Amateur Instrumental Society gave a Concert on the 24th ult. in the Montgomery Hall, under the direction of Mr. H. Coward. The programme included Haydn's Symphony in B flat, a selection from "Les Huguenots," and pieces by Schubert, Wagner, &c.

THE one hundred and fifty-sixth anniversary of the Royal Society of Musicians of Great Britain will be celebrated at the Hôtel Métropole on the 17th inst., when H.R.H. Prince Henry of Battenberg will preside.

MR. WYATT writes with reference to the report of the "Musical Association" in our last issue, that in the tenth line "the keys" should be "other keys," and in the sixteenth line "C major" should be "C minor."

WHEN we left St. Martin's Hall on the 16th ult., after sitting through two-thirds of the Musical Artists' Society's sixty-eighth performance, we could not help wondering whether the name of the said Society was not perhaps "wrote sarcastic." For the entertainment was, with one exception, anything but "artistic," and it was not very "musical" either. We have not the slightest prejudice against foreigners, but we must tell the four alien gentlemen who formed the String Quartet, that such playing as we heard on this occasion will not do for London. Poor Schubert, whose glorious D minor Quartet was at these gentlemen's mercy; poor Mr. Alfred Gilbert, whose two movements, "La Sera" and "Il Mattino," for strings, was entrusted to them; and poor Mr. C. Lawrence, whose so-called Pianoforte Quartet in A would no doubt have seemed less uninteresting and less puerile if better performers had been forthcoming. The one exception from the prevailing dullness was Mr. George B. Aitken's playing of a clever and artistic Pianoforte Suite in four movements, of which the final Fugue proved the most interesting. There were three vocalists, but their efforts were little to our taste, although Madame Alice Gomez had to repeat Mr. Gerard F. Cobb's "Spanish Lament." We did not stay to hear the Misses Christine and Bessie Greenhill play Grieg's Sonata in F for violin and pianoforte, and nobody who sat through what went before will marvel at our confession. The Society will have to procure better talent, and secure more artistic performances, if it wishes to be worthy of its name and to be taken seriously.

THE competition for the Sterndale Bennett Scholarship took place at the Royal Academy of Music on the 18th ult. The Examiners were Messrs. Alfred Burnett, Henry R. Eyers, Ad. Schloesser, W. G. Wood, and Arthur O'Leary (chairman). The scholarship was awarded to Theophil Wendt. The competition for the Parepa-Rosa Scholarship also took place on the same day. The Examiners were Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Messrs. William H. Cummings, Arthur Thompson, Fred. Walker, and Alberto Randegger (chairman). The scholarship was awarded to Lillian Louisa Crosby. The Examiners highly commended Gertrude A. Snow, Annie G. Boucher, and Ethel M. Hubi-Newcombe. The Charles Mortimer Prize (for composition) was decided on the 19th ult. The Examiners were Messrs. Algernon Ashton, Henry Gadsby, and William Creser. The prize was awarded to Marie Mildred Ames. The Examiners highly commended Hubert J. Oke. The competition for the Agnes Zimmermann Prize (for the encouragement of sight reading) also took place on the same day. The Examiners were Messrs. Henry R. Bird, J. A. Fuller Maitland, and Miss Agnes Zimmermann (in the chair). The prize was awarded to Sybil Palliser and Christopher Wilson.

THE Catford Choral Society gave a performance of Handel's "Samson" on the 19th ult., at St. James's Hall, Stanstead Road, Forest Hill, and once more demonstrated that it is fast becoming one of the most important of our suburban societies. We have frequently had reason to praise the singing of the choir, but on this occasion it surpassed its previous efforts. The attack and volume of tone in the magnificent big choruses were excellent, and the intonation never once wavered. There was, moreover, quite a refreshing artistic finish about the performance, and the painstaking training which the Conductor, Mr. Alfred Furse, must have given his singers was very evident. The soloists were Miss Florence Monk, Miss Meredyth Elliott, Mr. Maldwyn Humphreys, and Mr. David Hughes. They all did well, but Mr. Hughes deserves a special word of commendation for his fine rendering of "Honour and Arms," which raised a storm of applause. There was an enlarged string band, led by Mr. Kitcat, which did good service throughout; while the trumpet obbligato in "Let the bright Seraphim" was played by Mr. L. W. Hardy of the Crystal Palace orchestra. Miss Brissenden and Mr. A. Davidson Arnott were the pianist and organist respectively.

THE students of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind, in Upper Norwood, made an excellent display of their ability, on the 2nd ult., at Queen's Hall. The choir exclusively consisted of members of the Institution, and sang with remarkable attention to minor details a selection from Purcell's setting of Psalm iii., Sullivan's "O Gladsome Light" (in which the pitch was well maintained), Mendelssohn's setting of Psalm ii., "Why rage fiercely the heathen?" the same composer's Motet for women's voices, "O praise the Lord," Wilbye's "Sweet Honey-sucking Bees," and other pieces. Notable features also were Mr. Alfred Hollins's rendering, with Messrs. A. V. Belinski, H. Celis, H. Krause, and C. Ould, of Schumann's Quintet (Op. 44); Mr. Herbert Warrilow's execution, as organist, of Chipp's "Hymn to the Emperor," with variations; Master Horace Watling's playing of Paderewski's Minuet for pianoforte (Op. 14), and Miss Amelia Campbell's singing of "The Lost Chord." Throughout evidence was afforded of the efficiency of the musical training received. Dr. Campbell, the principal, delivered a short address in the course of the proceedings.

THE new building of the Royal College of Music, which is to be opened by H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, the President, in the name of Her Majesty the Queen, on the 2nd inst., has been erected from the designs of Sir A. W. Blomfield on a plot of ground granted to the College by the Royal Commissioners of 1851, and is situated almost midway between the Albert Hall and the Imperial Institute. The cost of the building has been met by a sum of £45,000, munificently presented to the Prince of Wales for that purpose by Mr. Samson Fox, of Leeds. The College is divided into two wings, one for the male and the other for the female pupils. The main entrance for the public is in the centre, leading into a handsome entrance hall. At each end of the building are placed the towers, which contain the organ rooms. Space is also left for the erection of a theatre and concert-room on the site at present occupied by a temporary hall, erected for the inaugural ceremonial. One of the most important rooms in the building will contain the extremely valuable collection of historical musical instruments formed by Mr. George Donaldson, and presented by him to the Prince of Wales for the permanent use of the College.

PIANOFORTE Recitals are not yet numerous, but we are promised a plethora of them during the ensuing two months. Mr. Frederic Dawson, a very talented executant—who, we believe, claims that musical county, Yorkshire, as his birthplace—announced three at St. James's Hall, the first of which took place on the 17th ult. Mr. Dawson is not afraid of hard work, for his programme included two of Beethoven's most arduous Sonatas: the "Waldstein" (Op. 53) and "Les adieux" (Op. 81), Mendelssohn's Variations Sérieuses, Schumann's "Papillons" (Op. 2), Liszt's Transcription of Bach's Organ Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, several pieces by Chopin, and Rubinstein's Staccato Study in C. This scheme must have been very fatiguing, but the player never once flinched from his work, displaying from first to last an astonishing measure of energy and mechanical dexterity. The audience was neither very large nor over-effusive in its applause, but those present could not have been dissatisfied with Mr. Dawson's efforts to entertain them.

AT the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Wilton Road, Easter Day was marked by the employment of an orchestra at the celebration of the Holy Communion. The music selected was Eyre in E flat, which was rendered with admirable effect on the part of both choir and orchestra. The fine body of twenty-four strings was heard to great advantage in Mackenzie's "Benedictus" (played during the offertory) and in Reinecke's Entr'acte "Manfred," and with the rest of the orchestra in Mendelssohn's "Cornelius" March. The orchestra also took part in the rendering of the Easter Hymn, arranged for the occasion by the Conductor as a Processional Hymn, with instrumental Prelude and Postlude, and in the hymn "Praise the Lord, ye heavens, adore Him." Mr. W. Douglas Capel, Organist of Keble College, Oxford, presided with much ability at the organ, and the service was conducted by Dr. G. J. Bennett. At the Dedication Festival, on the 6th inst., an orchestra will again be used at the morning service.

AT a meeting of the London section of the Incorporated Society of Music, on the 21st ult., Mrs. Clarinda A. Webster read a paper upon "Music in the Free Libraries," from which it appeared that the Committee of the Liverpool Public Library thirty-five years ago devoted a sum of money to buy music for the Lending Department, and that the number of volumes of music issued last year amounted to 8,065. Birmingham lends out yearly 9,619 volumes, and Cardiff 60 volumes per week, or about 3,000 annually, of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Dvorák, Grieg, Mackenzie, Wagner, and Raff. In London music is circulated by over a dozen libraries, the Camberwell and Minet collections being particularly good. Chelsea issues a separate reader's ticket for music. Fulham and Hammersmith make music a separate class, and the last reports show that the former has 181 volumes of music, with a yearly issue of 1,283, and the latter 155 volumes and an issue of 1,886.

Concerts of Wagner's music are at present so numerous that unless there is some special feature of interest, as, for example, the first appearance in London of the celebrated Carlsruhe and Bayreuth Conductor, Mr. Felix Mottl, notice of which will be found in another column, brief record is all that is required. Mr. Henschel found his reward in offering a supplementary Wagner Concert at the Queen's Hall, on the 11th ult., the attendance being very large. But there is no occasion to enter into details as to what was done, the programme and the manner of performance being perfectly familiar to the patrons of Mr. Henschel's Symphony Concerts. The scheme embodied excerpts from all the music-dramas from "Rienzi" to "Parsifal," with the exception of "The Flying Dutchman," and they were all rendered with spirit and intelligence by an orchestra of a hundred performers. There were no vocal pieces, but the want thereof did not seem to be felt by the enthusiastic audience.

Miss Guerra da Fontourra's Concert at Steinway Hall, on the 21st ult., had several attractive features. This lady, though suffering from a cold, did justice to Godard's "Angels guard thee," "Le parlate d'amor" (Gounod's "Faust"), and other songs demanding the nicest gradations of expression. Miss Ethel Barns, as violinist, played with appropriate spirit and exceptional neatness Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen," a Berceuse by Fauré, and a Mazurka of her own composition. The other instrumentalist was Mr. Jules Hollander, who executed some pianoforte pieces with facility. The Helen and Modus scene from "The Hunchback" was gone through by Miss Olive Kennett and Mr. Charles Fry with such tact and infectious animation as to obtain a double recall. Mr. Arthur Barlow sang well the Prologue to "Pagliacci," and Miss Norah Carew, Miss Urquhart Wilkinson, and Mr. Charles Butler were also contributors. Mr. Algernon Lindo accompanied.

The Clapham Popular Orchestral Society gave its first Concert at Brixton Hall on March 30, when a large and varied programme was carried out under the conductorship of Mr. S. Dodwell. Although formed scarcely a year ago, the orchestra of sixty players rendered the programme in a way which reflected great credit on the Conductor. The programme included Schubert's Overture to "Rosamunde," Mendelssohn's Capriccio for pianoforte and orchestra (the pianist being Miss L. Carpenter), the March from "Tannhäuser," and Haydn's Symphony in E flat. Mr. C. Furness Peters and Miss Grinyer ably rendered Langer's Duet "Grössmutterchen" for two violins, and the gentleman afterwards played Alard's Fantasia on Gounod's "Faust." Miss Beatrice Pettitt played as a cornet solo Schubert's "Serenade." The vocalists were Miss Ada Brown and Mr. S. Constanduros. Mr. Douglas Rogers was the accompanist.

Chamber music is evidently in favour in Hampstead. At the Drill Hall, on the afternoon of the 14th ult., a numerous audience assembled at the first of a second series of performances of works of the universally acknowledged great masters. Beethoven's Sonata for violin and pianoforte in E flat (Op. 12, No. 3) was well rendered by Messrs. Hubert Hunt and Walford Davies, each of whom subsequently took part with Mr. Charles Draper in Schumann's "Märchenerzählungen" for clarinet, viola, and pianoforte (Op. 132), and in Mozart's Trio in E flat for the same instruments. These performances earned the applause they received. For solos Messrs. Hunt and Davies respectively had Bach's Chaconne in D minor and Brahms's Intermezzo for pianoforte in E flat minor (from Op. 118). Mr. Harry Stubbs tastefully sang "Total eclipse" ("Samson") and Beethoven's "Adelaida."

The North-West London Philharmonic Society continues to make progress under the conductorship of Mr. Bernhard M. Carrodus. At a Concert at St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 10th ult., the band acquitted itself very creditably in Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture, in an "Angelus" for strings, by Mr. H. F. Sharpe, in the Intermezzo "Danse des Bacchantes" ("Philémon et Baucis"), in the accompaniments of Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte Concerto, and in other compositions of a high standard; its playing being marked by precision, point, and close observation of the bâton. Sullivan's work was given with special regard to light and shade. Mr. Sharpe won commendation for his reading of the solo part of the Concerto, and vocal pieces were effectively contributed by Miss Minnie F. Chamberlain and Mr. Arthur Strugnell.

Saint George's Day was celebrated at the Queen's Hall by the performance of a well selected miscellaneous programme of appropriately patriotic character. Although the audience was not large, it was very appreciative, and even went so far as to make an attempt to join in the chorus of Lady Arthur Hill's national song "For Union and for Queen," which was sung with admirable spirit and declamation by Mr. Robert Newman. The excellent playing of popular selections by the band of the Grenadier Guards, under the conductorship of Lieutenant Dan Godfrey, elicited much enthusiastic applause; and the singing of Miss Mabel Elliott, Miss Meredyth Elliott, Mr. Iver McKay, and the Meister Glee Singers was evidently much enjoyed, as presumably was also the dramatic rendering of the "British Army Quadrille," with which the Concert concluded.

Mr. Richard Mackway's Concert at Steinway Hall, on the 18th ult., included Mr. F. H. Cowen's "The Rose Maiden" and a miscellaneous selection of solos and part-songs. The whole of the music was performed by Mr. Mackway's pupils, some of whom justified their appointment for the work assigned them. The pleasing choral portions of the cantata were effectively sung, especially the chorus "A maid more beautiful." Miss Jane Hungerford and Mr. Milton Hunter were the most prominent soloists, the former distinguishing herself in the air "Bloom on." Miss Cicely Turner won deserved applause for her tasteful rendering of "Ask of yon ruined castle," and the accompaniments were capably played by Miss Bessie Jacobs and Mr. Allan Clark.

An excellent Concert was given on the 4th ult., at St. James's Hall, in aid of the Metropolitan and City Police Orphanage. The band of the A Division, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Haynes, played several selections; and the solo vocalists included Miss Ella Russell, Madame Gomez, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Norman Salmond, Mr. Andrew Black, and Mr. H. Grover. An interesting feature was the début of Miss Beatrice Frost, who, in Rossini's difficult "Selva Opaca," from "Guillaume Tell," and a new song, not without merit, by Lester Carew, used a voice of admirable quality in a way that spoke of musical feeling, intelligence, and careful training. In due time Miss Frost may reasonably hope to take a prominent position among soprano singers.

M. Emile Sauret gave a successful Violin Recital, varied by songs, at the Hampstead Conservatoire, on the 7th ult. The two most elaborate works in the programme were Beethoven's Duo Sonata in G major (Op. 30, No. 3) and Spohr's eighth Concerto, but other interesting pieces awaited the large audience in M. Sauret's own Adagio for two violins and solo, "Souvenir de Moscow," in a Sarabande et Tambourin by Leclair, and in Wieniawski's "Sielenka." In each of these M. Sauret exhibited his accustomed brilliancy of execution and mastery of expression. His pianoforte associate in the Sonata was Mr. Stanley Hawley (in lieu of the deceased Haydn Parry), and in his Adagio he was joined by Mr. F. Frederiksen. Mr. Charles Conyers sang several pieces in an able manner.

There is at present a strong demand for male quartet vocalists, and a recently formed organization of this kind, styling themselves the Westminster Glee Singers, gave a very successful Concert at the Westminster Town Hall on the 6th ult. The names of the artists are Messrs. Walter Coward, Charles Ackerman, Harper Kearton, and W. H. Brereton, and their combined efforts, which showed the results of careful rehearsal and perfect mutual understanding, were warmly appreciated. Solo pieces were contributed with success by Madame Clara Samuell, Miss Marian McKenzie, Madame Frickenhaus, and Mr. Whitehouse. The artistic efforts of the Trombone Quartet should not pass unrecognised.

Miss Winifred Williams, a pianist whose musical intelligence is equal to her executive powers, was assisted by several well-known artists at her annual Concert at Gresham Hall, Brixton, on the 11th ult. Heard to advantage in Chopin's Ballade in A flat major, the poetic spirit of which she accurately caught, Miss Williams enhanced the favourable impression thus created by the skill with which she executed the pianoforte portion of a Trio by Reissiger. In this Messrs. Arthur Payne and William C. Hann were her companions; Miss Ethel Williams, a promising juvenile pupil of Miss W. Williams, was encored in her rendering of Grieg's "Norwegian Bridal Procession."

The patriotic element in Mr. Frederick Bevan's Concert, given at St. James's Hall on "St. George's Day and Shakespeare's Birthday," was confined to a "Fantasia on old English airs," played by the body of eight instrumentalists and a pianist who style themselves "The Meistersingers' Orchestra"; but the numerous audience seemed fully satisfied with the programme provided them, which included two new songs by the Concert-giver, respectively entitled "The dream of my heart" and "The mighty river," sung by Mr. Edward Lloyd and Miss Clara Butt; and other ditties and part-songs, for the rendering of which Miss F. Bethell, Miss Greta Williams, and the "Dilettante" Vocal Quartet had been engaged.

Madame Frickenhaus gave a highly successful Concert at St. James's Hall on the afternoon of the 18th ult., the audience nearly filling the room. That refined, if not powerful violinist, Signor Simonetti, was associated with our able and conscientious English pianist in Beethoven's Sonata in G (Op. 96) and in three movements from a Suite for the same combination of instruments by Ignaz Brüll (Op. 42). Madame Frickenhaus played several small pieces by Tschaikowsky, Liszt, and other composers scarcely known as yet in this country, and the Westminster Singers contributed some unaccompanied pieces with success, singing in place of Mr. Norman Salmond, who was unable to appear in consequence of illness.

Miss Holland's Choir, conducted by Mr. Arthur Prendergast, took possession of the platform of St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 19th ult., for a benevolent object. One of the special elements of a Concert that drew a large attendance was a setting by Miss C. Holland, in the form of a choral ballad, of "Monk" Lewis's grim poem "Alonzo the Brave and the Fair Imogene." The composition exhibits perception of dramatic effect, though the means by which results are sought do not invariably commend themselves to the cultivated musician. There is no lack of spirit in the piece, and it sufficiently answered the purpose to which on this occasion it was turned.

The Triennial Handel Festival will, as already announced, be held at the Crystal Palace on June 25, 27, and 29, preceded, as usual, by a Grand Public Rehearsal on the 22nd. The Monday and Friday of the Festival week will, as on former occasions, be devoted to "The Messiah" and "Israel in Egypt," and a very interesting "Selection" will be presented on the Wednesday. The artists announced to appear are Madame Albani, Madame Melba, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Ella Russell, Madame Clara Samuell, Miss Marian McKenzie, Miss Clara Butt, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Andrew Black, Mr. Norman Salmond, and Mr. Santley.

Mr. J. W. Turner's English Opera Company performed "The Flying Dutchman" at the Crystal Palace, on March 29. With the song of the "Steersman" the manager is, in a measure, identified, as he was engaged to sing it so far back as the autumn of 1876, when Mr. Carl Rosa introduced, at the Lyceum, the English version of Wagner's opera. He fulfilled the same duty on this occasion at Sydenham. Mr. W. Ludwig repeated his able performance of the Dutchman, Mr. Ottley Cranston sang well as Daland, and Miss Chrystal Duncan was a satisfactory Senta. The performance was throughout warmly approved.

The fifth Concert of the present session of the Clapham Philharmonic Concerts was given at the Clapham Assembly Rooms on the 19th ult. The programme opened with a Trio by Gade and ended with another by Godard, the executants being Messrs. Lewis, Clement, and Sidney Hann. Pleasant variety was afforded by the singing of Miss Holford, and three part-songs written by Dr. George John Bennett—who presided at the pianoforte—were rendered by the ladies of the Clapham Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Walter Mackway. Solos by the instrumentalists named completed the programme.

Mr. Joseph Ivimey gave a Concert at the Assembly Rooms, Surbiton, on the 3rd ult., when he was assisted by Mrs. Helen Trust, Miss Minnie Chamberlain, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. W. G. Forington; also by Mr. John W. Ivimey and Miss Annie Grimson (pianoforte), Mr. A. Slocombe (violin), Mr. Alfred Hobday (viola), and Mr. Arthur Blagrove (violoncello). The chief features of interest were Schumann's Quintet (Op. 44) for pianoforte and strings (last movement), Haydn's Quartet ("Emperor") for strings, and the first movement of Rheinberger's Quartet for pianoforte and strings.

An agreeable Chamber Concert was given by Mr. T. H. Frewin at the small Queen's Hall, on Tuesday, the 3rd ult., the programme consisting entirely of his own compositions. These included a Sonata for pianoforte and violin, an Introduction and Tarantella for pianoforte and flute, and several songs. If Mr. Frewin cannot as yet be credited with much individuality of style, he at any rate writes with musicianly feeling and knowledge of effect. He received able assistance in the execution of his works from Mrs. Frewin, Mr. A. Fransella, Madame Vera, Mr. Karlyle, and G. R. Betjemann.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Moir's Vocal and Instrumental Recital at Queen's Hall, on the 10th ult., served to introduce several new compositions from the pen of the first-named. The best of these were "Thistledown" and "Mistress Rose," eminently graceful and refined productions. Mrs. Moir sang airs by Handel, Mendelssohn, and Hatton, and was successfully associated with her husband in his taking duet "Over the heather." Mr. Herbert Grover also sang; and Miss Lucille Hillier and Mr. Frederikson were heard in a Duo Sonata by Sjögren.

Mozart's Twelfth Mass and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" were performed by the St. Peter's Choral Society, at St. Peter's Hall, Brockley, on the 11th ult., under Dr. C. J. Frost's direction. The choruses throughout were well sung. The principal vocalists were Miss Florence Monk, Miss Marie Hooton, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. At the last rehearsal for this Concert Mr. E. N. Davis, the honorary secretary, on behalf of the members of the Society, made a presentation of a silver-mounted ivory bâton to Dr. C. J. Frost.

Under the conductorship of Mr. John C. Ward, the Regent's Park Choral Society closed its season on Friday, the 13th ult., at the Christ Church Schools, Albany Street, with a performance of Mendelssohn's "Athalie." The solos were efficiently sung by members of the Society, and Mr. Arthur Fayne contributed much to the interest of the work by his excellent recitation of the verses. Miss Addison presided at the pianoforte.

An excellent invitation Concert was given on the 4th ult., at Colet Court, Hammersmith, by the Colet Amateur Orchestral Society. The programme included a Symphony by Haydn and a spirited Overture by the Conductor of the Society, Mr. W. Arundel Orchard, who is to be heartily congratulated on the excellent playing of the orchestra under his direction. A few vocal solos added variety to the programme.

On the 12th ult. the Walthamstow Musical Society gave its last Public Concert of the season in the Victoria Hall, before a large audience. The programme consisted of Handel's "Acis and Galatea" and Bennett's "May Queen." The choruses were excellently sung, and the soloists, Miss Maude Ballard, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Frank Swinford, were most successful. Mr. H. Baynton led an orchestra of about fifty performers, and Dr. J. Warriner conducted.

The Kyrle Choir performed Haydn's "Creation" at Victoria Park on the 4th ult. The soloists were Miss Ada Loaring, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Arthur Wills. On the 18th ult. the same choir gave Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" at St. Augustine's, Bermondsey, with Miss Ada Loaring, Miss Rina Robinson, Mr. Ager Grover, and Mr. Arthur Appleby as solo vocalists. The Conductor was Mr. F. A. W. Docker on both occasions.

The annual Choral Festival at Deptford Parish Church took place at Evensong on the 15th ult., when Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and Schubert's "Song of Miriam" were performed, with organ and orchestral accompaniment. The Canticles were sung to Stainer in B flat. Mr. C. Hugh Rowcliffe rendered valuable aid at the organ, Mr. W. Marriott led the orchestra, and Mr. George Kett, Organist and Choirmaster, conducted.

OBITUARY.

We regret to announce the following deaths :—

Paul Fischer, in Zittau, on March 12, aged fifty-nine. Since 1862 he was singing-master at the local Johanneum, Cantor at the St. Johannis Church, and Conductor of a concert society founded by him in 1864. He was also known as a writer on musical subjects, many of his essays having appeared in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik.

Jacob Rosenhain, on March 22, at Baden-Baden, aged eighty-one. A pupil of Jacob Schmitt, Kalliwoda, and Schnyder von Wartensee, he started his career as a pianist, and toured as such. In 1849 he settled in Paris, where an opera, "Le démon de la nuit," of his was performed at the Grand Opéra in 1851; another, "Volage et jaloux," was given in 1863 at Baden, to which town he moved after the Franco-German war. He also composed three Symphonies, four Pianoforte Trios, three String Quartets, and a Pianoforte Concerto (played by Miss Fanny Davies at the Crystal Palace a few years ago), songs, pianoforte pieces, &c. In 1837 he was in London, and played at the Philharmonic Society.

Damaso Zabalza, on February 25, at Madrid, aged fifty-nine. Professor of the pianoforte at the local conservatoire, and composer of some 200 pieces for his instrument.

C. F. Burkhardt, at Zittau, on March 29, aged fifty-one. Conductor of several choral societies.

Dr. Johannes Schucht, at Leipzig, on March 30, aged seventy. A pupil of Hauptmann and Spohr. Since 1868 one of the editors of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, founded by Schumann. He also wrote biographies of Meyerbeer and Chopin, a book on harmony, three symphonies, an opera, "Embecinato," &c.

Severio Pucci, on March 16, at Venice, aged fifty-seven. Professor of singing at the Liceo Benedetto Marcello and an excellent flautist.

Enrico Bignami, at Genoa, aged fifty-eight. Violinist and composer, his opera, "Anna Rosa," having been given at the Paganini Theatre, Genoa, in 1872. He leaves a similar work, "Gian Luigi Fieschi," in manuscript.

Dr. W. J. Westbrook, on March 24, at his residence, Redberry Grove, Sydenham, aged sixty-three. The deceased musician's name is perhaps best known by his numerous "arrangements" for the organ, but he had also composed a great many works. He was for nearly forty years Organist of St. Bartholomew's Church, Sydenham, and for thirteen years Conductor of the South Norwood Musical Society. For many years he was an Examiner in connection with the College of Preceptors and the London College of Music. Dr. Westbrook was highly esteemed for his sterling personal qualities as well as his great abilities, and he will be greatly missed by a wide circle of friends.

The Rev. G. W. Barrett, Precentor of the Cathedral, Norwich, in which town he died on the 10th ult.

Herr Praeger, at Warrington, during the past month. The deceased, who was well advanced in years, was an admirable musician, but had experienced a somewhat chequered career. Thirty years ago he was principal viola of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, but he had of late devoted himself mainly to teaching.

Victor Florentin Elbel, at Nice, on the 1st ult., aged seventy-seven. Composer of two oratorios, "Der Münsterbau" and "L'Océan," a military Mass, and many other works. He was born in Strasburg, and after the Franco-German war removed to Nice, where he became Conductor of the Municipal Band, which under him became a first-rate body of players.

Armand Saintis, aged seventy-two, at Montauban, where he was director of the Free School for Singing. He wrote numerous part-songs, songs, pianoforte pieces, and dances, as well as a Mass.

By the death of Mr. Haydn Parry, which took place at Hampstead on March 29, the English lyric stage loses a composer who had displayed unusual ability, and given promise of excellent work in that branch of the art in which British musicians have so far least excelled. His music to "Cigarette" and "Miami," although necessarily light, was yet sufficient proof that he might have developed into a successful dramatic composer. Besides the two works named above, he wrote a cantata, "Gwen," and at the time of his death he was engaged on a composition for the next Cardiff Festival. He was a teacher at the Guildhall School of Music and at Harrow School. He was only thirty-five.

Dr. Philipp Spitta, at Berlin, on the 13th ult., aged fifty-two. He was one of the most distinguished of German musical littérateurs, and author of the splendid monumental "Life of Bach," of which an English edition, by Clara Bell and J. A. Fuller Maitland, was published by Messrs. Novello about ten years ago. He was born at Wechold, Hanover, and studied at Göttingen. From 1864-1874 he was schoolmaster at Reval and Sondershausen, and in 1874 he went in a similar capacity to Leipzig, where he joined the Bach Gesellschaft, and founded a Bach Choir. About this time he published the first volume of his Bach Biography, for which he had been collecting material for many years. The result of his labours was his being called to Berlin to become Professor of Musical History at the University, second Secretary of the Royal Society of Arts, and Managing Director of and Professor at the Hochschule für Musik. In 1885 he founded, with Dr. Chrysander and Dr. Adler, the famous Vierteljahreschrift für Musikwissenschaft, to which he contributed many valuable articles; a collection of them was recently published under the title of "Zur Musik." He edited the musical works of Frederick the Great, Buxtehude, and Schütz, and founded the extremely valuable series of ancient works now in course of publication under the collective title of "Denkmäler deutscher Tonkunst." At the time of his death he was engaged on a "History of Romantic Opera." Spitta had frequently expressed his conviction that he would die of apoplexy in his fifty-second year, as his father did, and his foreboding has, alas! come true. His death is an irreparable loss to the science of musical history.

Mr. Charles P. Smith, who died at the Guildhall School of Music, on the 18th ult., aged forty-three. He had been Secretary of this popular Institution since its foundation in 1880, and as he was responsible for the greater part of the administrative work, the striking success of the school is, without doubt, in a great measure due to him. Mr. Smith was at first connected with the management of an amateur orchestral society, conducted by the late Mr. Weist Hill. When the latter was appointed principal of the newly founded school, Mr. Smith was asked to become secretary. The remarkable growth (from 62 to 3,500 pupils) of this largest of conservatoires is a matter of English musical history, and Mr. Smith's name will be always closely connected with it.

At the Industrial Exhibition, South Kensington, which will open on the 5th inst., selections of music will be performed daily by the bands of the Grenadier, Coldstream, and Scots Guards, and two Organ Recitals will be given daily by Mr. H. C. Tonking.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ART OF CHANTING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—It was not, nor is it, my intention to enter upon a paper war with "A Cathedralist"; we must agree to differ about many things. But I should like to point out that in his letter this month he has not quoted me quite fairly in his last two paragraphs. It must be evident that I used the term "rallying-point" as synonymous with "accent-mark," taking the latter to mean that place where the barred time should begin, and I fail to see why there need be more "confusion" before this place, however chosen, in one system than in the other. As regards the second point, I was attacking the theory that the accent-mark preserves the seven-bar rhythm. If my letter in your March number be compared by your readers with "A Cathedralist's" rejoinder, it will be found that he has not been quite ingenuous in saying that I "contemplate the application of the bar throughout the chant, recitation and all." If he meant it for a joke, well and good, but in that case he had better follow the example of Artemus Ward and label it as such.—Yours faithfully,

April 17, 1894. J. Percy Baker.

ANCIENT GREEK NOTATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I have been much surprised of late to hear that persons who are presumably well acquainted with musical history have expressed doubts as to the possibility of translating the Greek music, discovered in November last at Delphi, into modern notation! The Greek notation has never been lost sight of. It is preserved in the works of Alypius, Gaudentius, Bacchius senior, Aristides, Quintilianus, and Bœthius. Greek rhythm certainly has been misunderstood until lately; but thanks to the discovery, in 1785, at Venice, of a MS. on Rhythm by Aristoxenus, (circa B.C. 300), and the publication by Bellermann, in 1841, of a treatise on music by an anonymous Greek writer of the second century A.D., we are now in possession of the rhythmical theory of Greece. The notation has been tabulated by M. Gevaert, in his "Histoire de la Musique de l'Antiquité," Vol. I. Ancient Greek music, as a matter of fact, can be translated into modern notation far more easily than that of the Middle Ages—say of the tenth, eleventh, or twelfth centuries.—I am, &c.,

April 21, 1894. C. F. Abdy Williams.

THE "MISSA PAPÆ MARCELLI" IN EDINBURGH.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Allow me to correct one or two of the statements made in your esteemed paper regarding the preparation of the "Missa Papæ Marcelli" by the St. George's Choir. Every practice except three was conducted either in the church or in the Session House.

As it was never intended to give a performance of the "Missa" in the church, the Session was never approached in regard to that matter.—I am, &c.,

Henry Hartley.

THE OLDER MUSICAL SOCIETIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Could you or any of your readers kindly inform me of the dates of establishment of the older existing musical societies? The Exeter Oratorio Society was established in 1846, and I am anxious to discover what societies, still existing, began before that date.

I should be much obliged if you would kindly insert this in your valuable paper.—Yours truly,

Exeter, April 23, 1894. John Galt.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Ambleside.—The Choral Society brought its season to a close on the 4th ult., by a performance of "The Messiah." The soloists were Miss Marjorie Eaton, Miss Simpson, Mr. Blagbro, and Mr. Copland. Mr. Collinson led a capable band, and the chorus-singing reflected great credit upon Mr. Reddropp, the Conductor.

Arbroath.—One of the most enjoyable Concerts yet given by the Choral Union took place in the new Public Hall on the 11th ult., when an excellent performance was given of Sullivan's "Golden Legend." The solos were admirably interpreted by Miss E. Davies, Miss A. Layton, Mr. C. Ellison, and Mr. W. H. Burgon. Mr. J. Hartley presided with skill and judgment at the organ, and the chorus and orchestra, the latter led by Mr. W. H. Cole, executed their respective tasks in a manner that reflected great credit on the Conductor, Mr. G. Neale.

Ashburne, Derbyshire.—An interesting performance of excerpts from the works of Gounod was given on March 29 by the Orchestral Society, led by Mr. W. R. Cave and conducted by Mr. Tutt. A good selection of glees and part-songs were well sung by the London Lyric Vocal Union.

Aylesbury.—The long-established Sacred Harmonic Society gave a successful performance of "The Messiah" on the 12th ult. The chorus-singing showed satisfactory results of careful rehearsal, and the solos were well sung by Masters E. Wood and F. Campbell, Mr. V. Jarvis, and Mr. G. Stubbs. Mr. R. S. C. Keymer, Organist of the Parish Church, conducted with his usual skill.

Barrow-in-Furness.—An excellent Concert was given on the 5th ult., in the Town Hall, by the Choral Society, assisted by the Lyric Union, with Mdlle. Olga de Mohl as solo vocalist and Mr. Frederick Dawson as pianist, under the conductorship of Dr. E. Brown.

Beckenham.—The Albemarle Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. C. A. Lidgey, gave its second Concert of the season at the Public Hall, on the 5th ult., before an appreciative audience. The most important work in the programme was Gounod's "De Profundis," the choruses in which were well rendered, the quartet artistically sung by Miss Green, Miss M. Burton, Rev. C. V. Day, and Mr. Beck, and the baritone solo by Mr. Eric Smith. Among other choral pieces was Mozart's "Ave Verum," the performance of which merits special praise. Pianoforte pieces were played by Miss L. Carr and violin solos contributed by Herr Gustav Schmidt, the rendering by the last-named of the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Concerto being greatly enjoyed. Other soloists were Mrs. Ernest Viney, Miss Ella Smith, Miss Cobbett, Miss Randell, Mr. Calver, and Mr. A. Cornish.

Biggleswade.—The sixth Concert of the District Choral Society took place in the Town Hall on the 19th ult., when Gaul's cantata "Una" was performed for the first time here, under the conductorship of Mr. J. G. Cooper. The principal vocalists were Miss R. Long, Mrs. Wilby, Mr. J. Bartlett, and Mr. W. Bennett, and an efficient orchestra was led by Mr. G. H. Wilby.

Blackburn.—The second Concert of the nineteenth season of the St. Cecilia and Vocal Union took place in the Exchange Hall, on the 17th ult., when Mendelssohn's "Athalie" and a miscellaneous selection were performed. The choir sang with remarkable precision and attack, and gave an altogether admirable interpretation of the choruses, and as the orchestra was that of Sir Charles Hallé it is needless to say that the instrumental portion of the Concert received full justice. The chief soprano part was admirably sung by Mrs. Hutchinson, the other parts being efficiently given by Miss Beet, Miss L. Beads, and Miss M. Walker (members of the Society). Mr. Charles Fry recited the verses, and after the accompanied recitation was heartily applauded. In the second part Mrs. Hutchinson was encored for a charming rendering of "Nymphs and Shepherds," and a special feature of interest was the powerfully dramatic recital by Mr. Fry of "Eugene Aram," with Dr. Mackenzie's appropriate incidental music. This had been specially scored for the occasion, and was admirably played by the orchestra under the skilful and vigilant direction of Mr. J. H. Rooks, who was throughout a most admirable Conductor.

Bodmin.—Handel's "Messiah" was given on March 28, in the New Public Rooms, by the Choral Society, supported by a professional orchestra led by Mr. H. V. Ball. The choruses were admirably rendered, and the soloists were Miss Ellery, Miss Jackson, Mr. Dean Trotter, and Mr. J. S. Bishop. The Rev. C. H. Townsend ably presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. C. E. Juleff, Organist and Choir-director of the Parish Church, conducted.

Broadstairs.—A highly successful Concert was given in the large Hall of St. Mary's Home, on the 11th ult., by the Broadstairs and St. Peter's Choral Society. The works performed were Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and Handel's "Acis and Galatea," with Madame Larkcom and Messrs. H. Lott and A. Osmond as soloists, under the careful conductorship of Mr. D. Lott. The chief interest of the Concert, however, lay in the production of a Symphonic Suite by Mr. H. Osmond, Organist of St. Peter's, Thanet. The work is cleverly written and was effectively played by the local orchestra, assisted by the Royal Engineers' band, under the able conductorship of the composer.

Broughty Ferry.—A praiseworthy performance was given on the 12th ult., in the Volunteer Hall, of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," by the Choral Union, under the conductorship of Mr. A. M. Stoole. The soloists were Miss E. Davies, Miss A. Layton, Mr. C. Ellison, and Mr. W. H. Burgon, the chorus was augmented by some ten or twelve members of the Dundee Choral Union, and the accompaniments were played by a small orchestra, ably led by Mr. W. H. Cole.

Burntisland. — Effective performances of Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" and Macfarren's "May Day" were given by the Choral Union, in the Music Hall, on March 28. The solos were sung by Miss M. Simpson and Mr. T. E. Gledhill, and the choruses rendered with admirable precision by about seventy singers. A small orchestra from Edinburgh, led by Mr. G. Banks, played the accompaniments, and Mr. Gray ably conducted.

Calne.—The annual Easter Concert was given in the Town Hall on the 9th ult., when Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm and Gaul's "Una" were performed by a chorus and orchestra of about sixty executants. The soloists were Miss C. Aldersley, Master E. Wood, Mr. E. Morgan, and Mr. J. Lomas. Mr. W. R. Pullein conducted.

Caterham.—A very successful performance of Sullivan's "Golden Legend" was given here on the 11th ult., by the Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Hunt. An excellent solo quartet was provided in Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Hannah Jones, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. The choral numbers were effectively sung, and Mr. F. Parker led an efficient orchestra.

Chard, Somerset.—The recently-formed Harmonic Society gave its second Concert on the 12th ult., when Bennett's "May Queen" was performed by a chorus and orchestra of about seventy performers. The solos were sung by Miss Lyon, Mrs. Powne, Mr. Small, and Mr. White. Mr. C. Fletcher contributed a violin solo with much acceptance. During the evening the Conductor, Mr. Tidman, was presented with a silver-mounted bâton.

Chigwell.—A large audience filled the Grammar School on the 6th ult., when a miscellaneous Evening Concert was given by Madame Strathearn, Miss Johnstone, Mr. H. F. Chamen, Mr. A. Barlow, and Mr. C. Barnard. Mr. Henry Riding accompanied.

Cirencester.—The Choral Society, assisted by members of the Cheltenham, Gloucester, and Tetbury choral societies, gave an excellent performance of Sullivan's "Golden Legend" on the 5th ult., in the Corn Hall. GABRIELLA. Lyric Drama in One Act. Composed expressly for and dedicated to Madame Adelina Patti. By Emilio Pizzi.

"It is many years since the musical public of this city has been given such a sensation as that caused by the first performance of Signor Pizzi's 'Gabriella,' at Music Hall, yesterday afternoon. . . . It is music that appeals to the heart and the sentiment of humanity, and yet has in it elements which gratify the higher intellectual faculties."—The Boston Sunday Herald, November 26, 1893.

THE LEGEND OF THE WOOD

A JUVENILE OPERETTA IN ONE ACT

FOR UNISON SINGING

VERSE BY

MAUD BALDWICK

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Mr. Gaul has followed up his beautiful Cantata 'Una' with a composition which, while full of charm, is in no wise to be compared with his more ambitious efforts. 'The Legend of the Wood' is a juvenile operetta in one act, the words—very pretty in their simplicity—being by Miss Maud Baldwick. We recorded the fact that the operetta was performed a few days ago, and we have very little doubt of its speedily becoming a popular favourite at schools. Mr. Gaul's music is very tuneful, and he has provided some taking and effective melodies for the vocalists, and for the chorus of 'mortals' and 'fairies.' One of the most graceful pieces is the chorus and dance, 'Now we fairies in a ring,' tempo di valse; though it is a somewhat difficult task to single out parts for special commendation where the merit is so even throughout. Mr. Gaul and Miss Baldwick are certainly to be congratulated upon this attractive trifle, in which evidence is provided of much skill expended upon a small affair. Simple as the music is it is always scholarly, and the verses are far above the average."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

A SHORT HISTORICAL ACCOUNT
OF THE
DEGREES IN MUSIC
AT
WITH A CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF GRADUATES IN THAT FACULTY FROM THE YEAR 1463
BY
C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS.

Extract from Preface.

The attention which has of late years been given by our Universities to the cultivation of music, and the endeavour to again make the degrees of Doctor and Bachelor in that faculty of substantial value, as marks of real musical erudition and culture on the part of the holder, as was formerly the case, have induced me to try and investigate the early history of these degrees which are peculiar to the English Universities, and are practically unknown abroad.

I have traced the course of the degrees from the earliest time they are mentioned to the present day, when the tendency becomes more and more marked to place music on a level in every respect with the other faculties.

THE CATHEDRAL PARAGRAPH PSALTER

CONTAINING THE

CANTICLES, PSALMS, AND PROPER PSALMS

ARRANGED IN PARAGRAPHS AND POINTED FOR CHANTING

TOGETHER WITH

A SCHEME OF APPROPRIATE CHANTS AND BRIEF NOTES ON THE PSALTER

EDITED BY THE

REV. J. TROUTBECK, D.D.

(Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, and Minor Canon of Westminster).

PRICE THREE SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE.

The principle of Pointing followed is that of the Cathedral Psalter, with slight modifications here and there, suggested by experience, in the treatment of individual verses. For the accents which are used in the Cathedral Psalter to indicate the beginning of the bar of duple time, which connects the free recitation with the metrical part of the chant, are substituted super-imposed musical notes, in accordance with the principle set forth in the Preface to the Cathedral Psalter, so as to indicate exactly, in every verse throughout the Psalter, the best method of dividing the bar into the component parts of a semibreve. Other means also have been adopted to ensure clearness and promote facility.

Prefixed to the new Psalter is a Scheme of Chants and some brief Notes on the History of the Psalter and the Characteristics of each Psalm.

As nearly simultaneously as may be, will be published

A REVISED AND GREATLY ENLARGED EDITION OF

THE WESTMINSTER ABBEY CHANT BOOK

In the preparation of which Dr. Bridge has been associated with Dr. Troutbeck. This edition will contain a full set of Chants appropriate to the new Psalter—single, double, triple, and quadruple—many of them written for the collection by well-known composers.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

This Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the Studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

MISS

FANNY DE BOUFFLERS

(SOPRANO)

For Oratorios, Cantatas, Concerts, Operatic Recitals, &c.

"THE SCOTTISH ORCHESTRA" (Mr. Georg Henschel, Conductor).—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers contributed much to the enjoyment of the audience. She refused an encore (thrice recalled) for a rendering of the Handelian Air 'Let the bright Seraphim,' but on again being enthusiastically recalled after singing "Should he upbraid," repeated a portion of it."—Glasgow Mail.

"Miss Fanny de Boufflers sang 'Should he upbraid' with a piquancy and brightness which suited the number admirably. The audience was thoroughly pleased, and insisted on a repetition, to which the artiste was finally persuaded."—Glasgow Herald.

CHERUBINI'S "O FONS AMORIS."—"A most excellent rendering was given of Cherubini's 'O fons amoris.' The very exacting solo (ranging from C to C in Alt) was splendidly executed by Miss Fanny de Boufflers, whose extensive compass and fine method were therein displayed to the greatest advantage. This work is one of the composer's six greater Motets. The intrinsic difficulty of the solo soprano part, requiring the extraordinary range of two whole octaves, renders the performance of the work a great rarity."—Liverpool Daily Post.

ROSSINI'S "STABAT MATER."—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers' interpretation of the 'Inflammatus' was at once prayerful and most artistic, and well worthy of her high reputation as an exponent of sacred music."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"ELIJAH" (Cambrian Choral Society).—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers sang the heavy work which is allotted to the Soprano with sympathy, fervour, and dramatic fire throughout."—Birkenhead Advertiser.

"A pure soprano, extensive compass, and fine method."—Liverpool Daily Post.

"A soprano of very considerable worth, receiving a most emphatic demonstration of appreciation from her hearers."—Glasgow Herald.

"Powerful and clear soprano voice."—Northern Daily Telegraph.

"Whose vocalisation was artistic and refined."—Western Daily Press, Bristol.

"Powerful soprano, considerable natural talent."—Manchester Guardian.

"Possesses a bright, pure soprano voice."—Walsall Observer.

"An artiste of decided abilities."—Waterford Star.

"Remarkably sweet and powerful soprano."—Cork Herald.

"Has a well-trained, pure and beautiful voice."—Harrogate Advertiser.

"Was a great success, received with unbounded applause."—Dublin Evening Telegraph.

"A Booklet" of Press Opinions, Répertoire, Photo, Terms, &c. forwarded on application. Address, Carlton House, Saint James Road, Liverpool.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

JUNE 1, 1894.

REFLECTIONS AND A RETROSPECT.

IN the first number of our present volume appeared an article concerning an important event to be celebrated six months later. It opened thus: "The first number of THE MUSICAL TIMES appeared on June 1, 1844, and on June 1 next this journal will have been in existence for half-a-century." The date then in the future is now the actual present, and the issue in our readers' hands represents THE MUSICAL TIMES invested with the dignity of fifty years. By anticipation the article of January last contained some very natural self-congratulations, and also words which magnified our office as the doyen of the English Musical Press. Self-quotation may be in bad taste, but gentle and sympathetic subscribers will leniently regard anything done amid the elation of so memorable a birthday, and we make bold to reproduce the following:

"A Jubilee in this department of artistic labour comes as an extremely rare event, having indeed, as far as England is concerned, occurred but once before—namely, on March 10, 1886, when our late contemporary, the Musical World, attained its fiftieth year. Our predecessors were comparatively short lived. The Quarterly Musical Magazine and Review lasted ten years only (1818-1828), and the Harmonicon had the same brief span of existence (1823-1833). As for our present contemporaries, they are all our juniors by considerable spaces of time. The Musical Herald (formerly Tonic Sol-fa Reporter) is now in its fortieth year; the Musical Standard was thirty in 1892; the Monthly Musical Record is a young creature of twenty-two. The others are infants."

By this it appears that THE MUSICAL TIMES had lived and laboured for ten years before the oldest of its now existing contemporaries was born. These are not days in which a doyen, as such, enjoys much regard. The world belongs to youth, and youth, ever self-confident and impatient, because convinced that, by some intuition, it has discovered all the secrets of life, is apt to regard age with contemptuous pity. The doyen belongs to the arm-chair and the chimney corner. His fate has always been looked upon as one from which to be delivered. Thus Shakespeare ("All's Well that Ends Well") makes the King of France pray:

> Let me not live
> After my flame lacks oil, to be the snuff
> Of younger spirits, whose apprehensive senses
> All but new things disdain; whose judgments are > Mere fathers of their garments: whose constancies
> Expire before their fashions.

Happily some of the institutions of men are superior to the individual creator. He decays and dies by an imperative law, against which it is useless to set up a repeal agitation; they, under fortunate stars, may see many generations and enjoy fulness of life when, perhaps, the dust of their founders has been dug up to make room for a railway station. The journalistic doyen, therefore, does not necessarily mean an arm-chair sage, more prosy than intelligible, and with no more power to emphasise an argument than had Mr. Smallweed when reduced to hurling soft cushions at the "brimstone chatterer" opposite. He rejoices in the true elixir of life, possession of which no individual man can compass. To him youth pays tribute of its own brain and energies. He is the Fee-fo-fum of our day, and uses up a succession of lives. Life has been defined as "the sum of the actions of an organised being"; in the case of a journal it is the sum of the actions of many beings. Nothing comes nearer the idea of perpetual youth; nothing so closely approaches that other and more subtle conception of perpetual youth laden with the accumulating wisdom and experience of age. What then if THE MUSICAL TIMES be doyen and fifty years old! Through us the journal declares itself more alive than ever it was—more expansive in form and spirit, more complete in organisation, more ready to discharge the obligations it has assumed. Tom Moore, when speaking of birthdays, said "each time the day comes round Less and less white the mark appears." In this case the expression "less and less" should be changed for its converse. Does the reader see in our words an excess of exuberance? Let him consider that, though fifty, we are young. Now, however, we will put on the gravity of age.

It is all very well for a man, or an institution, to boast of years; it is better to rejoice in having turned them to beneficial account. The idle and worthless sometimes reach a "good old age"—the only thing good about them—for Fortune does not, like Justice, carry a pair of scales and hold the balance even between merit and demerit. The question is: What has THE MUSICAL TIMES done during its half-century of existence? We propose to answer that, noting by way of preliminary that this journal, in its earliest stage, was a first product of, and next a conspicuous leader in the movement towards universal musical education which has since continued with ever-increasing speed. Than this there could be no more honourable genesis, and we pause for a moment to consider it.

In August, 1841, Joseph Mainzer found, after only two months' work at the propagation of his system, that there was need for some means through which his adherents could obtain knowledge of the progress made. He therefore published, at irregular intervals, a small sheet entitled the National Singing Circular. Of this we are told that it "rendered an ample record of the origin and progress of an undertaking which, it may safely be said, has been unexampled in the quickness of its growth, and the greatness of its results." In a very short time, the Circular began to impart general information regarding musical matters, and the demand was such that Mainzer resolved "to bestow upon it the form of a regular musical journal, published at stated intervals, and conducted on a broad and extended plan." The first number of the new series appeared on July 15, 1842, in 8vo, sixteen pages, and was entitled Mainzer's Musical Times and Singing Circular. It is curious that those paragraphs of the Editor's preliminary address in which he describes the character and scope of his journal might be issued now, were there need, on behalf of the present Musical Times, with very little alteration. Let us read one of them:

"The proceedings of the London musical season will be carefully chronicled, and care will be taken to procure the fullest information of a similar kind from every provincial town in the United Kingdom where music is cultivated to any considerable extent. The music of the Church will be a leading object of attention, and every effort will be made to make this exalted branch of the art more worthy of the holy purpose for which it is employed. Care will be taken, in an especial manner, to render this journal useful and interesting to that able and important class of English musicians upon whose influence and exertions the progress of the art so greatly depends—the organists of the churches and places of music throughout the kingdom; and the music which is to accompany each number will include many of the finest compositions of the great German masters for that noblest of all instruments. Similar pains will be bestowed in making the work valuable to the numerous madrigal, choral, and glee societies established in all parts of the country, not only by furnishing them with information, but by presenting them with rare and beautiful specimens of vocal harmony, of various ages and countries, adapted to their performance."

These promises were carried out with singular spirit, considering the period and its prevailing conditions, and this was The Musical Times in the preliminary stage which, with regard to our Jubilee, we do not account as life. The main point is, however, that the journal stands the direct outcome of a vast educational movement having as its object the good of the "million." We shall soon see that it became allied to, and largely representative of another movement, the corollary of the first, and neither less wide in aim nor less beneficent in effect.

"A Short History of Cheap Music," published by Novello, Ewer and Co. in 1887, contains this passage: "Mainzer's many publications, including 'Singing for the Million,' which phrase was taken by Hood as the subject of a humorous poem, were issued by the house (then known as J. Alfred Novello). The choruses of Mainzer's composition or selection were published at one penny each, 'marvellously cheap.' These were eagerly taken up and studied by the labourers in the many workshops throughout the length and breadth of the land." It was fitting that Mainzer's associates in providing music for those whom he had made students, however humble, of the divine art, should be the heirs of his journalistic enterprise. In 1844 The Musical Times, no longer "Mainzer's," entered upon the life which to-day has endured for half-a-century.

The last number of Mainzer's Musical Times appeared on May 1, 1844. It begins with an "Address to our Subscribers and Readers," in which the writer, after claiming that the journal had succeeded in its primary object, informed the public that narrow limits had placed difficulties in the way of achieving greater results, but that these would be largely obviated in the hands of a new proprietor. On the last page—the publication had shrunk from sixteen to eight pages—appeared Mr. Novello's own announcement, headed "Alteration of The Musical Times." The following is a transcription:

"The subscribers to this work are informed that the present series (the second, a new one having begun in May, 1843) will conclude with No. 13, for the month of May, and that on the 1st of June, a new series will commence under the title of The Musical Times and Singing Class Circular, published on the 1st of every month. It is intended by the new proprietors to improve, in a certain degree, the character of the work, which may now be considered as established in public favour. The music of the chorus will, in future, occupy at least three pages, and the greatest care will be exercised in its selection. The literary department will be superintended with an assiduous desire to combine interesting intelligence of the current month, reports of important musical performances, and a brief chronicle of minor events as they transpire; especially with a view to what may be interesting to Choral Societies and Singing Classes, including the announcement of all publications expressly adapted to their use. The form and size of the work will not be changed; whereby the new series will conveniently range, and bind up with the old numbers." Here follow particulars of the price (1½d. each number), publication, and so on.

Even in matters of business detail The Musical Times became, so to speak, welded with the arrangements made by its new owners for the provision of cheap music. In the book quoted from above may be read: "When THE MUSICAL TIMES was projected in 1844, the printer could not afford to break through the rules of the trade for so small a quantity of work as the issue of the paper promised. This caused Alfred Novello, as will be seen later, to enter upon the new business of type music printer himself. He would not abandon an undertaking which he foresaw would be of immense value in popularising music and helping the fulfilment of his cherished scheme, the reduction of the taxes on knowledge. The trades union relaxed its rule after three years' obstinate resistance. . . . It was now found possible to produce a readable page of music in an octavo size, suitable for use by performers at a concert, available as text books by audiences, and a cheap book of reference at all times." The full significance of Mr. Novello's act in setting up as his own music printer did not appear till later, but we can now estimate the part played by THE MUSICAL TIMES as a kind of agent provocateur in bringing about that important step.

Another interesting fact appears in "A Short History of Cheap Music," where it is stated that "the idea of the famous Octavo Editions issued by the house of Novello had its origin in the size selected for THE MUSICAL TIMES." Associations like the foregoing are worth dwelling upon at the present moment, and warrant some such pride as a man may legitimately feel in a warrior ancestor who helped to decide a struggle for the right. It is manifestly impossible directly to trace the influence of THE MUSICAL TIMES from the period when it became the ally and minister of cheap music. But we can consider what, in all reason, that influence must have been. Take, for example, the gratuitous issue with each number of an important composition, and then consider the price at which music generally was offered to the public. To quote once more from the "History":—

"Beethoven's Mass in C for four voices, with a separate accompaniment for the organ or pianoforte, arranged from the full score by Vincent Novello, is announced among the lists of new music, price twelve shillings; separate vocal parts, three shillings each. Jacob's National Psalmody, in boards, cost a guinea; a set of Chants for the Te Deum and Jubilate, and other parts of the Morning and Evening Prayer, with the words at length, taken from the above-named work, cost five shillings. . . . Henry Rowley Bishop's Cantata, 'The Seventh Day,' was the chief novelty at the time, but it never attained the popularity it deserved. The cheapest copy cost ten shillings. No cheap copies of Handel's oratorios existed, though every piece in Dr. Clarke's arrangements of Handel's works was printed separately. There was little or no demand, so the supply was limited."

We are further told that the pianoforte score of "St. Paul" was issued at thirty-two shillings, with the separate vocal parts at five shillings. Imagine these prices at a time when knowledge of music had begun to spread among the comparatively poor. One result was that a number of persons would club their little means to buy a single copy, and then set to with pen and music-paper at the task of transcription. Often have the then boyish fingers of the present writer sorely ached with hours of application to this delightful yet patience-consuming labour. A moment's consideration shows how welcome under these conditions must have been THE MUSICAL TIMES, with its monthly sheet of music, offered at a charge within the means of the poorest. The paper came like manna in the wilderness, or like a drink of water to the thirsty. Its monthly advent—we speak from personal recollection—was awaited with impatience, and no little speculation as to the nature of the piece it would contain. Then there was the keen delight of opening the little journal and of rehearsing the new treasure. It is pleasant to look back upon those scenes of fresh enthusiasm, and, no less, to contrast the few facilities then enjoyed with the many shared by a later generation. But the young musician of to-day, who knows only of abundance, cannot imagine how distinctly precious was THE MUSICAL TIMES as, month by month, it came to hand, the sole resource of those with purses too small for the price of music in other forms. That the journal nursed many a score of choral societies and singing classes all over the land is an absolute fact. It fed them with food both cheap and good. Their library was the musical supplements of THE MUSICAL TIMES; but, for that matter, each member had a steadily growing library of his own, and with the expansion of his store came larger experience and a wider outlook over the realm of art. As with the music issued with our journal in its young days, so with the literary matter, which, while unpretentious, opened up a new world to thousands of budding amateurs. Through this medium we began to make acquaintance with the great masters of music, to learn the opinions of cultivated minds, and to gain some idea of musical activities on the stage of the world—advantages not easily obtainable from the columns of the local newspaper, or through casual perusal of a high-priced London "daily." Perhaps the most useful feature in the journal at that time was the brief paragraphs recording the doings of musical societies and classes all the country over. Apart from the information they conveyed, and the means they afforded of estimating the comparative popularity of composers and their works, those paragraphs served to excite emulation and stimulate progress. It may appear a triviality in days of universal and indiscriminate publicity, but it is a fact that the chance of figuring in The Musical Times was sufficient to encourage a good deal of hard work at preparations for public display. The secretary, or some other member of the choral society, would report the concert—in no severely critical spirit, we may be sure—and the insertion of his statement always gave the keenest delight. It was in the lowly but useful capacity of such a local reporter that the writer of these remarks made his first appearance in the columns which now know him so well, and it was in The Musical Times that his name first obtained the honours of print. Charles Dickens has told us that, on sight of his earliest printed article, he bought a copy of the magazine and hurried down to Westminster Hall, there to gloat over his words in their new expression, and to indulge his emotion where there was little fear of attracting notice. Many such delicious moments has The Musical Times given to young aspirants who, though lacking the talents of Dickens, were equally endowed with quickness of feeling. The sum of all these influences must have been immense, and it should be remembered, in estimating the value of the agency which produced them, that The Musical Times was then the only musical journal which found its way into the homes of the people at large.

We have said enough to guide our readers in estimating the nature and extent of the influence of The Musical Times in its early years and in connection with the cheapening of music. The record of the journal is one which justifies no little pride in those at present responsible for its conduct. Moreover, it imposes obligations the full weight of which we feel, and the discharge of which is our greatest ambition because our highest honour.

We have much pleasure in giving, as an appendix to the foregoing remarks, a short paper written by Miss Sabilla Novello, with special reference to the important work done by Mr. J. Alfred Novello in furthering the combined interests of cheap music and of The Musical Times as its journalistic embodiment. It must be obvious that no one is entitled to speak with greater authority than Mr. Novello's sister, herself a labourer in the same noble cause:—

"The culture of music has wrought incalculable good amongst the working-classes, where its beneficent effect may be most palpably traced This great reform was precognised and made possible by my brother, Alfred Novello, the 'inventor,' as he is rightly called, of cheap music. Forty years ago the startling novelty of printing first-rate compositions at the price of a few pence was resented by some music publishers as a mischievous innovation, and was laughed at by others as a philanthropic but unfeasible scheme. The undaunted promoter of 'music and morals,' however, proceeded in his intent, undeterred by innumerable obstacles, and the wonderful result of his experiment is now generally appreciated. While his scheme was in its infancy he frequently ascertained how his 'hobby' prospered by visiting the different mills and factories, where, through his instrumentality, music was practised among workmen, and the reports received were yearly more satisfactory and flattering. Many benevolent mill-owners lent a large room, with gas, &c., wherein the 'hands' might meet for practice of an evening, and on the occasional visits of Mr. Novello encouraged the neophyte musicians to 'get up something' to show what they could accomplish. Whatever Englishmen undertake they carry out sturdily, so musical education flourished amongst these hard-handed, gruff-voiced sons of labour, who sometimes even performed an entire concert, orchestral and choral, without professional aid, in honour of the 'cheap music chap,' whom they hailed as their friend and benefactor. Once a workman in few unvarnished words set forth the matter clearly enough: 'Ye see, sir, afore your time, we couldn't buy big books as cost pounds, but tuppence is the cost of a pot o' beer, and many of us gives up our pot o' beer for a bit o' your music, which sarves us first, and then sarves our boys and gals arter!'

"Since the first introduction of good choral music amongst the working classes by its zealous propagator, the improvement in singing is so great that I fancy many of our workmen would astonish some musicians by the accuracy and ease with which they can sing (even at sight) compositions of considerable difficulty. How delighted would dear old Handel feel, could he hear his productions familiarly sung by thousands of his adopted countrymen!"

THE MUSICAL TIMES.

POINTS OF INTEREST IN ITS JOURNALISTIC AND LITERARY CAREER.

We now invite the reader to accompany us through the volumes of this journal as through a picture gallery. He will not be called upon to look up at "skied" canvases or to look down at those near the floor. We shall act as guide only to paintings "on the line," and only to such among those as are really of interest at the present day. The toil, therefore, will neither be wearisome nor prolonged.

We speedily meet with the "encore nuisance." On page 2 of No. 1 there is record of a Concert broken up by the obstinacy of an audience coming into collision with an inflexible resolution on the part of the Concert-givers to repeat nothing. The question involved is not yet settled.

In No. 5 (October, 1844) began the series of musical festival notices so fully developed, during his editorship, by the late Mr. H. C. Lunn; while in No. 6 we find the journal taking up the early closing movement, then in infancy, and pointing out its bearing upon the increase of choral societies and singing classes. Whatever note of prophecy sounds in the remarks of our early contributor has since been justified by events.

In No. 13 proof appears that Mr. Bonawitz's present idea of invisible musical performances was anticipated at Liverpool fifty years ago. A few months later appears the first reference to Holmes's "Life of Mozart"—a work so excellent as even yet to be a favourite; holding its own by the side of others which have had, in their making, the advantage of later and fuller research. Under date November, 1846, we read of a Musical Festival at Reading, where the connoisseurs of Berkshire and parts adjacent were wont to assemble. They now, if music be required, run up to London in a few minutes. In the year following, the numbers for January and February were issued together, and contained an interesting biography of Purcell, whose name was then very much to the fore. The issue for August, 1847, brings us face to face with the educational movement carried on by John Hullah, due notice being taken of the beginning of St. Martin's Hall, in which that successful teacher so long held sway, and where, let us add, the name of Gounod was first made known to English amateurs. Noticing, en passant, a Life of Palestrina, begun in September, we find, in January, 1848, the journal plunged into mourning by the death (November 4, 1847) of Mendelssohn, and giving due prominence to a careful article on his genius and career. This was followed by the first enlargement (February, 1848) of The Musical Times—from eight to twelve pages. Inasmuch as the dates and particulars of successive enlargements appear in our issue of January last, it is deemed unnecessary further to mention them here. Of the first, however, it may be said that its occurrence, when the paper had been in Mr. Novello's possession three years only, shows that the stamp of success was soon placed upon his enterprise.

In March, 1850, Mr. Edward Holmes began, with an article entitled "Curiosities of Musical History," a series of contributions which were of the utmost value, not only for the extent and variety of their information, and for the sound judgment they so eminently displayed, but because they gave The Musical Times a strong flavour of literature, raising its tone and standard above what was then considered good enough for journalism. Holmes followed up his first paper with a series on "Cathedral Music and Composers," which extended over fourteen months; then giving way to another series on "English Glee and Madrigal Composers." In May, 1852, appeared the first Review of the London Season—a feature which was continued till a few years since, and for many years most carefully done by Mr. H. C. Lunn. About this time references may be found to the "Taxes on Knowledge," which it was the dearest wish of Mr. Novello's heart to see abolished. The proprietor mentions in the issue for April, 1852, that the taxes to be paid by him on that single number amounted to £24 10s. 10d. We can hardly conceive such a state of things in our present blessed state of freedom from the tradition that universal education and enlightenment mean political and social chaos.

A steady flow of important contributions now set in. In October, 1852, Mr. Holmes began his famous descriptive and analytical notices of Mozart's Masses. Nine months later G. A. Macfarren delivered part of an interrupted discourse upon Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," and in December of the same year a first article by Leigh Hunt gave additional literary distinction to The Musical Times. Apropos, we have received the following memoranda from a venerable lady pre-eminently entitled to speak of the facts they record:—

"For some time (about the years from 1853 to 1856) Mary Cowden-Clarke was Editor of The Musical Times, and during that period there were several delightful articles written for it by Leigh Hunt. They were:—

Inexhaustibility of the subject of Christmas	Dec. 1, 1853.
Twelfth Night	Jan. 1, 1854.
An effusion in Cream and a desideratum in English Poetry	Feb. 1, 1854.
On Poems of Joyous Impulse	March 15, 1854.
Eating Songs	May 1, 1854.
On the combination of Grave and Gay..	June 15, 1854.
An Organ in the House, I.	Sept. 1, 1854.
" " " " II.	Nov. 15, 1854.

Charles Cowden-Clarke contributed a memoir of a chorus-singer in the number for December 1, 1853, and his wife gave a long series of papers entitled 'Music among the Poets and Poetical Writers,' that went through many numbers of The Musical Times during the above-mentioned years, citing some of the choicest quotations from the most celebrated English authors on this fascinating subject. The first paper of this series appeared in The Musical Times for February 1, 1855."

With such contributors writing upon subjects they perfectly well understood, it is no matter for surprise that the journal began to attract attention outside the circle to which it was first addressed, or that it disabused some minds of a notion that literature and music have very little to do with each other. Leigh Hunt's papers are by no means the least readable of that versatile author's productions, but no doubt many of his acquaintances wondered how he came to be in such a galley. However, there he is, and it is worth while going back forty years to see him.

For some time in 1854, and also in the year following, The Musical Times appeared fortnightly. The interest of its contents was well sustained throughout this period, Mr. E. Holmes entering upon analyses of Haydn's Masses, and Miss Sabilla Novello coming forward as contributor of an article on Paganini, which she followed up with "Truth about Music and Musicians"—such musicians as Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. A communication from Miss Sabilla Novello on the subject of her connection with The Musical Times may be given here, though it somewhat anticipates events:—

"In 1863 I translated for The Musical Times Hoffman's musical story, 'The Sanctus,' and subsequently 'Letters on Music and Musicians,' from the German; 'Soirées d'Orchestre,' by Berlioz, from the French.

"About 1865 it was proposed to insert into The Musical Times my work 'On Voice and Vocal Art.' But as it contains anatomical delineations of the throat and lungs, some fear was entertained that these might startle general readers; however, hoping that the love of instruction might make them acceptable, they were printed with the text, and the result proved a triumph in the cause of science, for the sale of The Musical Times increased that very year by several thousands.

"An American authoress, Mrs. John Farrar, in her book 'Recollections of Seventy Years,' devotes a chapter to the Novello family. It commences thus: 'In travelling through England at any time for the last ten years, you may have seen at every railway station a framed placard with the words "Novello's Cheap Music." On enquiring the meaning of this, I was informed that a music publisher had brought within the reach of moderate fortunes and of professional musicians the compositions of the great masters, such as Purcell, Beethoven, Mozart, Handel, and others, hitherto published in such an expensive manner as prevented their being known to thousands capable of enjoying them.'"

In the middle of 1857 Handel filled the scene. The Musical Times was occupied with the first Handel Festival and Schœlcher's life of the master—two creations which have survived till now, though most of the actors in the first, and the author of the second, have passed away. In March, 1858, Mr. Holmes was busy with his analysis of Beethoven's Mass in C, and the editor kept hammering at the obnoxious "taxes on knowledge," with some damage to them in public estimation, and no little credit to himself, for by this time the journal had obtained a circulation without precedent in the history of musical periodicals. In December, 1858, for example, notice was given of the issue of 10,000 copies. Reviews were added to the regular contents in April, 1859, and have since remained a conspicuous and important feature. Later in the same year, The Musical Times sustained a very serious loss by the death of Mr. E. Holmes. That excellent and careful writer's last contribution to the paper he had served so well was an article headed "Domestic Music," with which closed a series as valuable to the cause of musical enlightenment in England as to the periodical in which they appeared. Other events marking kindred changes had to be recorded in our columns, among them the public farewell of Madame Clara Novello at the Crystal Palace and the death of Vincent Novello—announced in the issue for September, 1860. The life and labours of that active and earnest musician, whose services to his art in a time of change can hardly be estimated too highly, were set forth at length by his daughter, Mary Cowden-Clarke, in the numbers for January and February, 1862, the first part of the biography being accompanied by a portrait of the deceased.

Some new contributors appeared about this time, to make up for losses. John Parry sent in a paper on "Ancient British Music," and Caroline Reinagle gave "A Few Words on Pianoforte Playing." A dead writer, moreover, was laid under contribution, the number for September, 1862, and its four immediate successors, containing instalments of "A Draught for the Particular History of Phonics; or the Doctrine of Sound and Hearing," from Lord Bacon's "Sylva Sylvarum." An illustration of a memorial window to Vincent Novello appeared in September, 1863, at which time the late Mr. H. C. Lunn became editor, and entered upon duties which, for many years, he discharged with unwearied industry and a high sense of responsibility. The influence of Mr. Lunn soon appeared in the pages of the journal over which he had been called upon to preside. Not only did the new editor hasten to contribute articles on the music of the Church, but he instituted a separate department for the notice of London concerts, and limited the "Brief Chronicle" to events happening in the provinces. This was a fitting recognition of the importance of the Metropolis as the chief musical centre in the country.

From 1864 to 1866 musical interest was largely concerned with the Letters of Mendelssohn, Mozart, and Beethoven, then for the first time presented to English readers in Lady Wallace's translation, which, however inadequate, served to individualise the three great masters. Each volume was reviewed in The Musical Times, and to the same period belong a number of important articles, from which we select the following for mention, as showing the variety and scope of the journal's contents: "Position of English Professors" (H. C. Lunn), "Bishop's Glees" (G. A. Macfarren), "History of Musical Notation," and "Music of the English Church" (Macfarren). It was in May, 1867, that The Musical Times announced the establishment of Barnby's Choir, under the auspices of Novello & Co.—a step which gave the now famous choral conductor a position in that capacity, and started him on his upward career. In February, 1869, the interminable question of musical pitch was discussed in these columns, and, two months later, Dr. Pole began his valuable "Story of Mozart's Requiem," which ran through seven numbers, and was read from beginning to end with eager interest. But the chief feature in that part of the paper's career was the work done for it by G. A. Macfarren. In January, 1870, appeared an article on Bach's Passion Music, from the distinguished musician's pen. In July, same year, he began a series of articles, entitled "The National Music of our Native Land," which continued through seven numbers, and later, he discussed "Oratorios in Church," Bach's "St. John Passion," "Accompaniment of Recitative," Handel's "Theodora," &c. Dr. Stainer also took his place as a contributor with a paper on "The Rhythmical Form of an Anglican Chant." At this period——and no wonder!—the circulation of The Musical Times reached 14,000 per month.

Passing on to July, 1873, Joseph Bennett is first met with as a writer for this journal. His initial article was one entitled "The Drift of Modern Music." It was followed by, amongst others, "Touching up the Masters"—a protest against meddling with illustrious scores, and some analytical papers on the Masses of Schubert. From that time to the present, as our readers know, Mr. Bennett has remained on the staff of The Musical Times as a constant contributor. Meanwhile Macfarren was further represented in these pages by an article on "The Pictorial Power of Music," and very valuable service was rendered by Mr. Ebenezer Prout, who discussed Handel's Chandos Anthems (March, 1876) and Bach's Mass in B minor, which occupied three papers. The production of the "Nibelungen" Trilogy at Bayreuth, in 1876, was recorded at length by Mr. Bennett.

In January, 1877, the journal having been enlarged to forty-eight pages, a new feature was added in the Foreign Notes, now so conspicuous and useful a part of its regular contents. Among the subjects treated in the volume for that year are the still vexed one of Musical Degrees, "The Influence of Handel on Music in England," and "The History of Music-printing from the fifteenth to the nineteenth century" (Chrysander). In 1877, also, Mr. Bennett began the series of articles on the "Great Musicians," which did not end till 1892. Some of these have been published separately as "Primers of Musical Biography." Other contributors now arrived upon the scene, among them Mr. W. H. Cummings, with papers on the National Anthem; Mr. Salaman, with remarks upon "Music in Connection with Dancing"; Mr. Carl Engel, with articles on "The Literature of National Music" and "Music of the Gipsies"; and Mr. Niecks, with a dissertation on Beethoven's "Missa Solennis." There were others. Mr. Ludwig Nohl was represented by a paper on Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and a series on "The Father of the Symphony"; the Rev. H. Parr by remarks upon "Collections of Chants," and Mr. H. Heathcote Statham by several valuable contributions. We note, in 1880 and the following year, papers by Mr. Niecks on "Berlioz and his Critics" and on Schumann; a series on "Pepys the Musician," by Dr. Hueffer, and (April, 1881) the first English notice of the rising star of Bohemia—Antonin Dvorák. This was written by Mr. Bennett, who, later, did the same service to the "Carmen" of Bizet.

Here our review of The Musical Times as a journal of musical literature may end. The rest belongs to very modern history and must still be fresh in the memory of our subscribers. It is a record of which we have no reason to be ashamed, since it shows, amid, no doubt, many defects, a steady and earnest purpose to improve the scope and character of the journal, and to make it more and more worthy of the art to the service of which it is consecrated.

Much might be said with regard to the musical compositions which have appeared in these pages, and the writers thereof. But it must suffice to point out that the proprietors, though having a vast store of works ready to hand, and in all respects suitable for use in The Musical Times, were careful to publish, from time to time, music specially written. Among the pieces thus given to subscribers at first hand were Goss's "O Praise the Lord" and "Christ our Passover," and Hopkins's very popular "Let us now go even unto Bethlehem." That these were distinctly valuable additions to English Church music must be admitted by all, but here we regard more the evidence they afford of direct encouragement to Church composers and of a genuine resolve to show that new works by them could be placed within the reach of the poorest.

SOME PICTURES OF THE PAST.

In view of the special character of this Jubilee number, we have substituted for our usual portrait illustrations some cuts which appeared in the Illustrated London News (to the kindness of whose proprietors we are much indebted) fifty years ago—at a period, that is to say, when The Musical Times was about to pass from its initial and experimental stage and be enrolled among permanent and regular journals. They are of interest as affording glimpses of musical life and doings when the art, as compared with what it has since become over the length and breadth of this country, had but little more than left its infancy behind.

The "Interior of the Italian Opera House" means, it should be said, the interior of the building since better known as Her Majesty's Theatre, which, in 1867, some of us saw go up in flame and smoke. This theatre was built in 1790 on the site of one destroyed by fire two years earlier, and, in designing it, the architect, Michael Novosielski, adopted the lyre-shaped interior for the first time in England. There were five tiers of boxes, the house giving accommodation to 3,000 persons, and its acoustics were well-nigh perfect. The special occasion represented in the cut was a State visit paid by the Queen and Prince Albert on July 20, 1843; the commanded opera being Rossini's "Il Barbiere." According to the Illustrated London News, "it would be difficult to convey an idea of the fascinating display of titled beauty, wealth and brilliancy assembled within the walls of the high court of the aristocracy of fashion" on the night of the Royal visit. The performance alone should have attracted such an audience, without the aid of State pageantry, for the cast was not to be equalled then or since. Grisi played Rosina, and Mario, Almaviva; the Bartolo being Lablache, the Basilio, F. Lablache, and the Figaro, Fornisari. The scene represented on the stage is, of course, that in which the pretended music-master gives a lesson to Rosina. It will be noticed that two Yeomen of the Guard are shown standing in that part of the stage which is nearest the Royal box. This was a feature at all State visits to the Opera fifty years ago. It has since gone the way of many other cumbrous, though, mayhap, picturesque observances. There was a time, let us add, when privileged persons were actually admitted to the stage, and had seats at the wings, during performance. (See Hogarth's "Beggars' Opera," which the painter-poet, William Blake, so finely engraved.)

In his "Reminiscences of the Opera," Benjamin Lumley mentions the State visit of July, 1843. From him we learn that no such honour had been paid to the lyric stage in England for ten years, from which it, of course, follows that this was the first occasion of her Majesty's visit to the Opera in her public capacity. Mr. Lumley further mentions that, between the acts of "Il Barbiere," Fanny Ellsler and Cerito danced a pas de deux by the Queen's express desire.

Balfe's "Bohemian Girl," which supplies a subject for our second illustration, was written for Alfred Bunn, as manager of Drury Lane Theatre; Alfred Bunn, as poet, providing the libretto. It was first performed on November 27, 1843, with Miss Rainforth as Arline, Miss Betts as the Gipsy Queen, Mr. Harrison as Thaddeus, Mr. Stretton as Devilshoof, Mr. Borrani as the Count, and Mr. Daruset as Florestein. It is a curious fact that this extremely popular opera did not at once secure public favour. "It was not," writes Mr. W. A. Barrett, in his biography of the composer, "until nearly a fortnight had passed, that anything like adequate houses rewarded the venture." But, "the houses, from being indifferent, sometimes worse than indifferent, became gradually fuller, till at last the crowded state of the theatre . . . began to show a brilliant pecuniary, as well as artistic, success." Thereupon Bunn wrote Balfe to this purport: 'Come back to London. "Bohemian Girl" is a triumph. Houses crammed every night.' And so it went on till the hundredth night."

The scene represented in the cut—which did not appear till a month after the first performance—is that in which Arline, through the machinations of the Gipsy Queen, is arrested for theft and carried before Count Arnheim, who soon recognises her as his long-lost daughter. Looking at the stage accessories depicted by the artist, we readily see that fifty years ago it was thought worth while to spend much money upon the mounting of an English opera, in which respect London, certainly, has made no advance, for English opera, when played at all, is flung on the stage anyhow.

Hanover Square Concert Rooms, an interior of which is shown in our third cut, were built in 1774-5, on the site of a house and garden belonging to the Earl of Plymouth. The land was bought by Lord Wenman for £5,000, and conveyed, the same day, to G. A. Gallini (a famous dancing-master, knighted by George III.), J. Christian Bach, and C. F. Abel. The rooms were opened February 1, 1775, with one of Bach and Abel's subscription concerts, and then entered upon a brilliant musical career which those do not forget who now see the premises turned into a club-house. Among the enterprises which flourished or came to grief in these Rooms are the Professional Concerts (1783-93); Salomon's Concerts (1791-92 and 1794-95); the Ancient Concerts (1804-48); the Vocal Society (1832-37); the Philharmonic Concerts (1833-66), and Henry Leslie's Choir, which re-opened the Rooms, after alterations, in 1862. The last concert was given, December 19, 1874, after which the premises were taken over by the Hanover Square Club and opened as their house in 1876. Many a London amateur looks back upon these Rooms with regret. The acoustics of the concert-room were perfect; the atmosphere of the place was social and homely, and the arrangements for the comfort and pleasure of visitors were as good as need have been. But when the circle of metropolitan music-lovers increased, greater accommodation became indispensable, and thus the historic premises fell from their high estate.

The Musical Union, to which our fourth cut refers, was established in the same year as The Musical Times, its founder being Mr. John Ella, an orchestral violinist of no particular mark. Mr. Ella had the wit to see that his true vocation was that of entrepreneur, and it must be ungrudgingly acknowledged that he well filled the post from 1844 onwards through a long course of years. It should also be pointed out that he arranged the constitution of the Musical Union with great tact, and gained the support of the aristocracy—for whom he had much regard—in carrying on the first attempt to establish an enterprise devoted to chamber music. For many years the concerts of the Musical Union, conducted with spirit and with a certain exclusiveness (half-a-guinea was the price of a single ticket), enjoyed great vogue. The conductor was indefatigable in obtaining prominent artists from the Continent; he had an eclectic choice in music, and by means of analytical programmes, first used by him in this country, he strove to make his supporters take an intelligent interest in the works performed. The popularisation of music killed the Musical Union. For one thing, the "Pops" arose, and when the best performances could be heard for at most five shillings, it was not in the nature of things that a more costly rival, however select and however much glorified by aristocratic prestige, could continue to flourish.

The artists represented in the wood-engraving are Vieuxtemps, Deloffre, Hill, and Piatti; Mr. Ella may be recognised seated at the table between two ladies. Concerning Vieuxtemps and Piatti there is no need to speak here. The second violinist, Louis Michel Adolphe Deloffre, was a French artist, born in Paris, 1817; died in the same city, 1876. He first came to London with Jullien, and for some years settled here, obtaining engagements at Her Majesty's Theatre, the Sacred Harmonic Society, the Philharmonic Society, &c. Eventually he returned to Paris, where he succeeded Tilmant as chef d'orchestre at the Opéra Comique. Deloffre was a composer as well as executant, not only writing largely for his instrument, but trying his hand also at orchestral symphonies, pianoforte trios, &c.

Hill, the viola player in the quartet, was for many years the chief professor of his instrument in London. Subsequent to his engagements at the Musical Union he enlisted under Mr. Chappell at the Popular Concerts, retaining his position till his regretted and premature death. He was succeeded by Mr. Doyle.

Jullien's famous "British Army Quadrilles" were first produced on November 2, 1846, by four military bands and the regular orchestra, with the help of a gigantic long drum, which required a performer at each end. A funny notice of the concert appeared in the Illustrated London News, from which we take the following passage: "Nothing dismays him (Jullien). He provokes the stringed combatants, excites the brass enemy, and rallies the drummers: it is hard to decide which is to win—the lower orchestra, his regulars, or the guerillas on the heights; but Jullien has a reserve—it is a monster long drum; and when that is brought up at a critical moment it is sauve qui peut with the stringed fighters, and victory is proclaimed in favour of the brass and parchment, amidst what the Yankees would term an everlasting smash." The big drum was, of course, fair game for press humorists, and Albert Smith made some "copy" out of it for his "Tracts for the Trains" (this title reminds one of Leigh Hunt's "Readings for Railways"), then publishing in the illustrated journal above named. The great exploiter of Mont Blanc announced that a bigger instrument still was making for use in a set of waltzes called the "Bombarding Battalions," adding that Jullien had arranged for the entire British Army, 108,672 men, to take part in the performance, under the direction of F.-M. the Duke of Wellington. On the top of the drum, which was to be worked by steam, the leading members of the orchestra would have seats, though it was feared that the first blow might send them up in the air. Smith supplied a drawing of the drum and its machinery, also of its interior fittings, when not in use, as a three-floored residence. We reproduce both these jeux d'esprit. It should be added that, according to the lively Albert, the piano passages in the "Bombarding Battalions Waltzes" were to be played by 200 ophicleides.

As well as a big drum, Jullien introduced a monster ophicleide, a sketch of which and of its performer, M. Prospere, drawn to scale, we now reproduce. The first appearance of this machine at the Hanover Square Rooms was humorously described by a contemporary pen: "When seen slowly ascending as it were from out the floor among the gentlemen of the orchestra, considerable consternation arose, some imagining that, as steam is now made to do everything, they were about to witness a novel application of its powers to the manufacture of sweet sounds, by means of some machine of which the funnel was the first part introduced to their notice. But when Prospere stepped forward and, boldly grasping the brazen pillar, proved that one small mouth could bring out its mighty tones, merriment and delight took the part of surprise and perhaps dismay."

There remains to add that the supplement given with this Jubilee number is a fac-simile reprint of the first issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES, June 1, 1844. The contrast is suggestive, and we must still go on. With all true progressives "the goal of yesterday is the starting-point of to-morrow."

FIFTY YEARS AGO.

IN attempting to sketch a picture of the state of an art at any given time, note has to be taken not only of conspicuous events, but also of prevailing influences—less obvious indeed than the former, but of far greater significance as determining factors of the march of history. Such influences, it is evident, originate at periods anterior to that under examination, and therefore our title, "Fifty years ago," must not be taken too literally. The music of 1844, like that of every other year, was a compound of endings and beginnings, of rising and waning artistic tendencies, of passing fads and ideas of permanent value and effect. To deal adequately with it on the lines we have just indicated would, however, be impossible here—since a volume rather than a page or two would be necessary. Our purpose, moreover, is more modest—we seek but to draw attention to a few salient features of the epoch which saw the birth of THE MUSICAL TIMES, and to revive, for a few moments, names that are half or wholly forgotten.

The third and fourth decades of this our century were marked by a degree of intellectual activity the force of which may be measured by its rich results in the present day. Locomotion by means of steam, the introduction of the penny post, the foundation of the British Association for the advancement of Science, the removal of the taxes on literature, and the spiritual renascence whose expression in the domain of art gave rise to what is called the "Romantic" school—these are a few of the signs by which that activity is recalled. Now in music Romanticism found a particularly apt medium for the utterance of its mysterious yearnings and suggestive, but not always very sharply defined, imaginings. And music, therefore, more fully than any other art, felt the force of the new spirit. In the early 'forties' Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin, Liszt, Berlioz, Marschner, Spontini, Spohr, Meyerbeer, Verdi, Thalberg were in full career; Wagner's star was in the ascendant, and Gounod was beginning to make a name. Among English composers, Balfe, Sterndale Bennett, G. A. Macfarren, John Barnett, Bishop, Loder may be named as the most conspicuous. Cherubini, Bellini, Hummel, Field, Paganini were but recently dead—were as near to the musicians of that day as Wagner and Liszt are to us; and Beethoven, Schubert, and Weber had not been twenty years in their graves. The most "advanced" of these were not, it is true, much known, and their influence was small, but the character of their work indicates clearly the direction in which some at least of the foremost intellects were tending.

Passing from composers to their works, let us see what was going on in Opera House and Concert Room. Here, to begin with, is a list of the operas heard at Her Majesty's during the season of 1844: Bellini's "Norma" and "Puritani," Cimarosa's "Matrimonio Segreto," Costa's "Don Carlos," Donizetti's "Adelia," "Lucrezia," "Don Pasquale," "Lucia," "Anna Bolena," Hérold's "Zampa," Mozart's "Don Giovanni," Ricci's "Corrado d'Altamura," and Rossini's "Cenerentola," "Semiramide," "Otello," and "La Gazza Ladra"—Ricci's, Costa's, and Hérold's for the first time. To these must be added four new ballets: "Esmeralda," "La Vivandière," "Zelie," and "La Paysanne." It is in operatic matters that the contrast between now and then is most striking: Rossini, Donizetti, Bellini — little else. The new Italian School represented by Verdi's "Ernani"—the first of his works presented in England—was afforded a hearing in the following year, a desire for something more dramatic and virile being already in the air, even in England, as we may easily gather from a trenchant criticism in the Musical World of August 22, which begins: "We are frequently asked why we so seldom notice this establishment (the Italian Opera), and our answer invariably is that we do not reckon it within the pale of things musical . . . it is not in us to keep awake during the chef d'œuvres (!) of Bellini and Donizetti. . . . We cannot endure their eternity of quadrille tunes—still less their noisy, scratchy instrumentation—and least of all their abominable carelessness of dramatic propriety" — with more to the same tune that may still be read with profit. The singers at the Opera that year included Persiani, Grisi, Lablache and his son, Favanti, and Mario; and the dancers, Mesdames Carlotta Grisi, Cerito, and Fanny Elssler. Costa was conductor, and the orchestra and chorus are spoken of by contemporary critics as having considerable merit.

But if the state of things at the Italian Opera was less satisfactory than it is to-day, English Opera was in far better case. The works, perhaps, were not very great, but at least they were composed, and produced with successful results. Balfe's "Bohemian Girl" was "running" at Drury Lane (it was produced in December, 1843), to be succeeded in November by his "Daughter of St. Mark"—his "Quatre Fils Aymon" being produced in the same month at the Princess's Theatre; and in April Benedict's "Brides of Venice" was given for the first time at Drury Lane. On the night of the hundredth performance of the "Bohemian Girl" Balfe was presented with a testimonial in the shape of a service of plate. The following year saw the production of Loder's "Night Dancers" and Wallace's "Maritana," the last of which was so successful as to raise hopes of the permanent establishment of a "British School of Dramatic Music."

Turning to the concert-room, the chief event of the season—which, by the way, is spoken of by an eminent critic of the time as "an almost unprecedentedly brilliant one"—was the visit to London of Mendelssohn, who came over at the special invitation of the Philharmonic Society to conduct the last six Concerts of the season. This great musician, whose artistic and personal fascination exercised so great an effect on the music and musical taste of this country, introduced several works by great composers that are now old favourites. Amongst other things, it will be remembered that the Philharmonic orchestra, at his wish, tried over for the first time Schubert's Great Symphony in C, and laughed at it. The season was altogether a memorable one. At the fifth Concert Herr Joachim, then thirteen years of age, made his first appearance in England, playing Beethoven's Violin Concerto with a mastery that extorted the admiration of the severest critics; and at the seventh Concert Signor Piatti made his first bow to an English audience. Mendelssohn also conducted "St. Paul" for the Sacred Harmonic Society on two occasions and played at several concerts, on one occasion with Moscheles and Thalberg, the work being Bach's Triple Concerto. That must have been a thing to hear! The Philharmonic Concerts which preceded the arrival of Mendelssohn were conducted respectively by Sir George Smart, Sir Henry Bishop, and Cipriani Potter. At the fourth—the first conducted by Mendelssohn—the Symphonies were Mozart's in E flat and the conductor's own finest instrumental work, the Symphony in A minor, since universally known as the "Scotch."

That Mendelssohn, even in 1844, was however by no means appreciated at his full value by the public at large may be inferred from an advertisement of Messrs. Cramer, Beale and Co., inserted in the Musical World, in which new works by Thalberg, Mendelssohn, and Leopold de Meyer are announced. Thalberg's name figures at the top in solitary grandeur, and underneath, Mendelssohn and Leopold de Meyer (!) share a line, in smaller type, between them. Lower down, "A Grand Sonata, by Thalberg," appears in prominent letters, with the information that "a larger sum has been paid for it than was ever before given for a similar work"; and below, in smaller type, comes an enumeration of four new works by Mendelssohn. Under this, but in much larger letters, appear the names of Moscheles, Döhler, and Herz. Fortunately, Time re-arranges these little matters; and, happily, perhaps, for our self-respect, we cannot hear the old gentleman's laughter during the process.

As, however, Thalberg had played in the previous year at the Philharmonic Concerts, and the Directors themselves had refused to allow him to play any but his own music, in spite of his expressed wish to prove himself capable of worthily interpreting a classical masterpiece, the public and its purveyors cannot justly be made to bear the whole blame for the topsy-turvey state of public taste. And, on the whole, a glance at the programmes of the chief concerts given fifty years ago, if not perhaps provocative of envy, excites no feeling either of pity or amusement. The names of the great masters — Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven especially—figure frequently, and contemporary composers—Italian, French, and English—are well represented. Besides the Philharmonic, there were, in London, the "Societa Armonica," the Society of British Musicians, the "Ancient Concerts," the "Melophonic" Society, which aspired to rival the "Sacred Harmonic"; the Provincial Festivals (in 1844 the 121st meeting of the Three Choirs took place at Gloucester); and, of course, a number of miscellaneous concerts given either by more or less well known resident professors and composers, or by foreign visitors. Among those who then gave such concerts may be named Mr. Benedict, Madame Dulcken, Sterndale Bennett, Giacinto Marras, G. A. Macfarren, Henry Wylde, Ernst, L. de Meyer, Braham, Henry Russell, and John Parry. 1844, too, saw the establishment of Ella's "Musical Union," which continued to exist till 1880. At Covent Garden, Jullien's Promenade Concerts had established themselves solidly by their successful appeals to all classes of the community. The mob were caught by the sensational effects, and musicians of sense were tolerant on account of the real excellence of the performances and of the artists employed. It is worthy of note that the first Bal Masqué was given at Covent Garden by Jullien, on March 4, 1844, at the close of his concert season. Among the "novelties of the season" announced by this strange mixture of artist and charlatan in the following December, when his concerts recommenced, was "La Polka." "This dance," the advertisement continues, "which has attained a most unexampled popularity, and created a complete revolution in all the Soirées dansantes of last season, was first introduced at the private balls of the nobility by Mr. Jullien, but has never yet been performed in public by the author." That was fifty years ago. Well, Jullien's "La Polka" was assuredly less vulgar than the "St-St" polka, which formed so striking and objectionable a feature at Covent Garden last autumn. We cannot afford to "throw stones" at our musical ancestors on account of their Concerts, that is clear. We beat them hollow, however, in the number of our Pianoforte Recitals. Here, at least, we can crow from the highest dunghill within reach with perfect safety, and with the assurance that if our ancestors know why we are crowing, they will heartily appreciate their residences underground. It was Liszt, by the way, who invented the Pianoforte Recital, which, in one of his witty moments, he described as "Le Concert—c'est moi!"

MUSICAL CRITICISM IN 1844.

Musical taste and musical education have unquestionably made great strides in the last fifty years. When we look back on what our fathers or our grandfathers admired in the forties, we are tempted to indulge in the famous Homeric vaunt. None the less, it is impossible to avoid being struck by the manner in which the old critics expressed themselves—even when they were farthest astray in their estimates. We have been turning over the pages of the Athenæum for 1844, on the staff of which H. F. Chorley was already installed as musical critic, and although his remarks are occasionally palpably unfair and prejudiced, his trenchant and forcible style renders them invariably most entertaining reading. Chorley got many hard knocks, but he gave as good as he got, and very often he gave them in the right place. Here, for example, is an excellent warning to a singer who affected "the mouthing traditions of the so-called English school. The 'charnel-house tone' in which Mrs. Crummles invited Nicholas Nickleby to partake of the shoulder of mutton was not more out of taste than is the beadle style of emphatic delivery by which so many of our male singers—aye, and some of high repute—seek to impose upon their audiences." Of Dr. Joachim he writes in the next number: "So thoroughly grounded seems to be this young professor in musical science, as well as in executive skill—so liberally gifted in the essentials of head, heart, and health—that we see no limit to his future career; and if the creative faculty develop itself, shall look for a great artist in him, in the most comprehensive acceptation of the term." If Chorley shone as a malleus stultorum, he also had a keen eye to detect solid merit. In the Athenæum of May 18 it is curious to read "there is just now in London three times as much vocal music, or thereabouts, as is to be found in any German city or in the French metropolis during its fullest season." What would Chorley have said to the present concert glut! As an instance of the change in musical taste which has taken place in fifty years, we may note that at one of the Ancient Concerts, of which the Prince Consort was Director, there appeared a Signor Pergetti, described, we fear prematurely, as the last of the artificial soprani. It is at least certain that no such performer could gain a hearing at any concert in London to-day. "Painful," writes the Athenæum, "as this voice sounds to our ear, the study of its particular powers and uses is indispensable alike to the mere musical analyst and to the student of vocal science." At the same Concert one of Beethoven's "Leonora" Overtures was performed, and Chorley, after remarking that this "superb work" was "tamed into nothingness by the sluggish conduct of Sir H. Bishop's bâton," adds: "At the inspiriting Coda the band would break away, leaving their conductor to follow Jill's example, and come tumbling after." As regards conductors, Chorley's motto was certainly nolo episcopari! In the Athenæum of May 18 there also occurs an interesting reference to that historic rehearsal of the Philharmonic orchestra at which the attitude of the band to Schubert's C major Symphony so irritated Mendelssohn that he withdrew both the Symphony and his own new "Ruy Blas" Overture. According to Chorley, the Overture was played through, though in Sir George Grove's life of Schubert in his Dictionary, it is said that it was not even tried. Turning over the leaves of the Athenæum we come across the following characteristic entry in the announcement of John Parry's annual concert, at which Staudigl and Joachim lent their assistance: "Mr. John Parry will have the honour of singing a new historical romance, 'Fayre Rosamunde,' A.D. 1164, by Albert Smith, and a new song, 'My Déjeuner à la Fourchette,' by the late T. H. Bayly." Here again is a curious and interesting paragraph in the issue of June 1: "There seems no limit to the arrival of musicians this year; we have pianoforte players by the dozen . . . while on stringed instruments, guests of high pretension are 'plenty as blackberries.' Among the most recent are M. Sainton, a violinist of Parisian renown, and Signor Piatti, a violoncellist." Chorley is quite at his best in this number. Thus of young Joachim's performance at the Philharmonic he happily says: "Then came Beethoven's Violin Concerto, played by Herr Joachim and, what is more, played with." After describing his cadenzas as "marvels of musician-like skill and young invention," he continues: "Very few performers have come before us so satisfactory, and for the future so brightly promising as this boy; who seems, too, to possess a strong frame and a disposition so modest, as well as cheerful, that the perils of praise are less formidable than usual." The "Midsummer Night's Dream" music is dealt with in terms of equally felicitous eulogy, while a performance of Beethoven's "Choral" Symphony at the Ancient Concerts is scarified in the following picturesque passage: "As to this performance, it will be long remembered as the ne plus ultra of Sir H. R. Bishop's *mis*conduct: the drawling tempo might have been forgiven if there had not been screaming; and this, again, had the notes been sung, might have been overlooked—nay, one might have been gentle with all the vocal wonders and blunders of the very difficult solos, had the orchestra been alive and ready." It is in the same number, again, that Chorley remarks of an unhappy vocalist: "The lady sang her solos [in 'Il Matrimonio Segreto'] in better tune than usual; but in the concerted music, she is a dead letter or worse—very often wrong, and rarely audible when right." We wonder what Mr. William Archer, who has been complaining of the severity of modern dramatic critics, would say to the methods of Chorley!

Though the amount of music discoursed in the London season of 1894 may be treble that heard fifty years back, the quality of the interpreters of the earlier date need fear no comparisons with those of to-day. At Moscheles' Concert, on June 1, Bach's triple Concerto was played by the concert-giver, Thalberg, and Mendelssohn—a noble triple alliance. The violinists of the year besides Joachim, included Vieuxtemps and Ernst, of whom we may be permitted to recall the following pleasing anecdote. Ernst sent a cheque for £74—being his share of the receipts of his and Moscheles' Concert—to the Royal Society of Musicians, and in the accompanying letter begged that the gift might be considered as coming not from himself, but the public, to whom, in compensation for the disappointment caused by his breakdown through illness at the Concert, the money had been thus returned. The Athenæum comments on the rare delicacy with which Ernst's generosity was administered, and after expressing the desire that his next concert will be liberally patronized by the public, adds: "Let it not be as in the case of M. Liszt, who, on solicitation, gave up his own morning to the benefit of the Poles, and was permitted afterwards by our liberal world of Rank, Fashion, and Charity to play on his own behalf to empty benches!" Another eminent instrumentalist who was constantly before the public in 1844 was Camillo Sivori, while to the list of pianists may be added the name of Döhler. Of great singers there was indeed a goodly galaxy—Madame Viardot, Grisi, Mario, Lablache, Moriani, and Staudigl being perhaps the most remarkable of our visitors.

Chorley, as we have seen, was an admirable critic where he was able to appreciate, and did excellent work in his trenchant exposure of charlatanry or slovenly execution. His range, however, was limited, and his references to Schumann, and, above all, to Berlioz, were uniformly unsympathetic and often contemptuous. Of the "Kreisleriana," for instance, he says: "Not even the solid and intellectual playing of the composer's lady could make these rhapsodies intelligible," while in the same article he speaks of Schumann as the "editor of the revolutionary periodical which set itself against the 'rights divine' of authority, rhythm and melody as understood by the old composers." Let us, however, conclude these extracts with a more favourable specimen of the work of a critic whose lucubrations may be invariably studied with interest and often with real profit by his colleagues of to-day. Chorley records the death of Charles Filtsch, the gifted boy pianist and adds: "The sword wore out the scabbard. The applause and the excitement, the (to a foreigner) trying hours and hot rooms of London, we fear, did their part in destroying a frame as delicate as it was finely organized. These things should be dwelt upon, in remonstrance to a public always too selfishly engrossed with its own pleasures—in warning to all relations of the gifted, who are generally injudiciously anxious to anticipate the harvest of praise and profit. For one prodigy who recovers from the forcing system, and lives to strength and manhood, there are twenty who die its victims!" These wise and weighty words are every whit as worthy to be laid to heart in 1894 as they were fifty years ago.

Some days ago, Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. forwarded to the Right Honourable W. E. Gladstone, M.P., a copy of their "Short History of Cheap Music," together with special copies of the three Musical Times Supplements devoted respectively to Handel, Mozart, and Beethoven. The firm explained, at the same time, that these publications had not been brought under his notice earlier because of reluctance to intrude upon time and attention so strenuously devoted to great affairs of State. With the high courtesy characteristic of the right honourable gentleman, Mr. Gladstone returned an acknowledgment of the presentation written by his own hand. Our readers will be interested in its perusal:—

Dear Sirs,—I receive your gift with particular pleasure, as proceeding from a firm which is inseparably associated in my mind with the introduction of cheap (instead of frightfully dear) music into this country, and thereby with the remarkable extension of musical taste, knowledge, and practice among the people of this country during the last half-century.

I remain, Dear Sirs,

Your very faithful and obedient,

W. E. Gladstone.

Dollis Hill, N.W.,
May 18, 1894.

We may not allow this welcome letter to pass without remarking that the connection between the late Premier and the cause of cheap music and popular journalism is closer than the younger among our readers may suppose. The advertisement duty was abolished in 1853, the newspaper stamp in 1855, and the paper duty in 1861. Of these great steps towards the liberty of untaxed printing, the first was taken with Mr. Gladstone as Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right honourable gentleman gave up the seals of that office in February, 1855, but not before he had prepared the way for the repeal of the newspaper stamp Act in June following, under Sir G. Cornewall Lewis. Mr. Gladstone was at the Exchequer again when, in 1861, the paper duty was abolished. It may, therefore, be said of the great statesman that he stands almost in loco parentis to the enterprises which have flourished and are now flourishing, as a result of those beneficent measures. The Musical Times assuredly salutes its benefactor, though he himself, with characteristic modesty, would no doubt pass the compliment on to the memory of Milner Gibson. Nothing, however, can alter the facts of history.

Not the least agreeable feature of the jubilee which we celebrate in the present issue of The Musical Times is its occurrence in a year so rich in interesting anniversaries. For, to begin with, 1894 is the tercentenary of Palestrina, the glory of the golden age of pure vocal music, and the artistic ancestor of all the great composers from his own day to ours; and of Lasso, one of the shining lights of the famous Netherlandish school. Again, the year 1894 is of special interest in connection with three of the most illustrious instrumentalists of the century, marking, as it does, the fiftieth anniversary of the birth of Señor Sarasate, who saw the light at Pampeluna, on March 10, 1844; and the jubilee anniversaries of the débuts in England of Dr. Joachim and Signor Piatti. The former, who visited England at the express recommendation of Mendelssohn, made his first public appearance at a Benefit Concert of Mr. Bunn's. He was then announced by the Concert-giver as "the wonderful Hungarian boy," a piece of unauthorised puffery about which, as Dr. Joachim recently told a friend, Mendelssohn never ceased chaffing him. But his formal début was at the Philharmonic Concert on May 27, when he played Beethoven's Concerto with his own cadenzas, and achieved a veritable triumph. It was at one of the Philharmonic Concerts also, in the same season, that Signor Piatti first established his incontestable claim to rank among the great executants of his time, though he had already appeared at a Concert given by the eminent pianist, Döhler. Furthermore, it was in 1844 that the late M. Sainton first visited this country, with which he was destined to be so long and honourably associated; and, finally, Mr. W. Kuhe's Jubilee Concert, held on the 28th ult., reminds us that he too arrived here in 1844.

On October 15 fifty years will have elapsed since the "Waltz-King," Johann Strauss, made his début as a Conductor, and the grateful Viennese will not let the jubilee pass without showing the popular composer their appreciation of the delight which his music has given to millions of dancers as well as to countless others to whom Terpsichore's art has no charm, but who have been fascinated by his bewitching strains, so full of refined tune, captivating rhythm, and genuine Viennese esprit. The Festival Committee, which includes Brahms, Goldmark, Hans Richter, Jahn, Hanslick, &c., has already decided on striking a Johann Strauss medal and presenting an address. Festival performances of works by Strauss will be given in the Vienna theatres, and Eduard Strauss's famous band will take part in a Promenade Concert in the great Musikvereinssaal, while the Philharmonic Society and the celebrated Vienna Male-Voice Choir are to arrange a Concert which is to be conducted by Hans Richter, Court Capellmeister Fuchs, and Eduard Kremser. A banquet follows as a matter of course, and the performance of a special Festival play, by Julius Bauer, will bring to a close what promises to be a unique event.

The students of the Royal Academy of Music are to be congratulated on the happy inspiration which took effect on the morning of the 17th ult. After the rehearsal for the Commemoration Concert at Queen's Hall, they presented Dr. Mackenzie with a valuable loving cup and a handsomely illuminated album. Mr. Frederick Corder, in a graceful little speech, introduced two of the youngest students of the Academy, who presented the gift to the Principal. The album bore the following inscription: "To Alexander Campbell Mackenzie, Doctor of Music of the Universities of St. Andrew's and Cambridge, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, this album and the accompanying gift were presented, May 17, 1894, by the students of the Royal Academy of Music as a token of their deep respect and esteem, and in gratitude for the unfailing kindness and devotion with which he has directed their studies throughout the past six years, the presentation being made on the occasion of the Concert given to commemorate the 70 years' work of the Institution." Dr. Mackenzie, who spoke with evident emotion, said that, completely surprised as he was he felt sure that they would extend their kindness and forgive him if he failed adequately to express his feelings. The proceedings had disillusionized him in one respect. He had hitherto flattered himself that he knew everything that was going on in the Academy, but now he discovered that a good deal might go on without his knowledge, and also that it was possible for a large body of young ladies to keep a secret. He had had many public distinctions conferred upon him, but no gift had touched him more deeply. It was not the time or place to speak of the work of the school; but they might feel assured that whatever was done was prompted by the sincere desire for their good; and he was glad to have an opportunity of acknowledging the ever ready assistance rendered him by his good colleagues on the Committee. He should ever do his very best to promote the welfare and success of the old Institution. The Academy Students may be sure that their appreciation of the services of their worthy principal will long be remembered by all who value the acts which bind human hearts more closely together.

The degree which should have been conferred upon Grieg last summer, when the Cambridge University Musical Society celebrated its jubilee, had to be postponed till the 10th of last month, when the chosen representative of Scandinavian music was, if not in the most robust health, sufficiently recovered to journey to Cambridge for the purpose. Grieg's remarkable popularity with all sections of cultivated society—of those whose proclivities are not exceptionally musical as well as of the inner circle of musical enthusiasts—was shown by the warmth of his reception, both in the Senate House and at the Concert in the Guildhall, at which he was afterwards present. Like many great composers before him, Grieg's eminence is not to be measured by his height, and some time was spent in adapting to his stature by means of the domestic pin the doctor's gown lent him for the ceremony, while the saying that "extremes meet" was amusingly illustrated by the presence on the floor of the Senate House of Dr. Alan Gray, Professor Stanford's successor in the Trinity College organ loft, who, in spite of his innate modesty, must perforce look down upon his professional colleagues. At the Chamber Concert given in the evening by the University Musical Society, Miss Fanny Davies and Mr. Gompertz played Grieg's Pianoforte and Violin Sonata in F (Op. 8), with a finish and unanimity which showed that the composer's presence put them on their mettle. Miss Marie Brema sang three of Grieg's songs with much warmth of expression, and Miss Davies gave a powerful rendering of his Ballade (Op. 24). Our older Universities have been accused of narrow-mindedness, but the proceedings on this "Grieg Day" indicate that Cambridge at least is ready to do honour to genius—even though not home-made. After conferring degrees on nearly all the chief contemporary English composers, and many of the foreign ones, the field of choice is now somewhat restricted.

Under the head of "Bibliografia Musicale," in the issue of the Gazzetta Musicale di Milano of the 13th ult., may be found an exceedingly sympathetic review of Dr. Mackenzie's "Bethlehem." After giving some biographical details as to the composer and his previous works, the writer proceeds to describe "Bethlehem" as a work in which the genius of the composer finds peculiarly congenial scope, and a masterpiece of its kind. The character of the work, continues the critic, is of the "biblico-dramatic" type, adding that although the dramatic importance of the work is conspicuous, the musical interest is paramount. The chief features of the music of "Bethlehem," in the opinion of the writer, are its masterly concerted vocal writing and its elegant instrumentation. Finally, he goes on to express a regret that works of such importance and beauty should remain outside the ken of Italian audiences. Opera is undoubtedly the most striking modern product of Italy; but, as he justly remarks, the young Italians exhibit an undue neglect for other departments of composition, and from the study of such works as "Bethlehem" must learn to realise, what they are in danger of forgetting, that the theatre is very far from exhausting all opportunities for musical expression.

Our last issue contained a description of the "Hymn to Apollo" discovered at Delphi in November last. To-day we are able to give the text and musical notation of this interesting relic, which is in all respects the most important musical "find" of the nineteenth century. Though not so old as the fragment from Euripides given in our last number, it is, musically, of much greater interest, on account of its length and the excellent preservation of the text—due to the material (marble) on which it was inscribed. We give the Hymn in two forms—one for students, which contains the original text and musical signs, with the latter rendered into modern notation; and another for general use, the version which was sung at Athens and in Paris, which will be found in our extra supplement. It may be sung, as in Paris, by a single voice or, as it was given in Athens, by several; in either case, that hearer must indeed be dull who fails to be impressed by the sounds of a melody composed when Ancient Greece was not only a name, but a power. The missing portions of the text have been restored by M. Henri Weil wherever possible, and M. Theodore Reinach has published a conjectural restoration of the music to these portions. The notation shows several of the same features as are found in the two fragments we quoted in our last number. Where the same note is to be repeated on two or more syllables, as in bars 2, 3, &c., the sign is only given over the first syllable, and where a single syllable is sung to two notes it is repeated under each note, as in bars 8 and 10. The signs denoting time value and accentuation are omitted, but these can be gathered from the metre of the words. The pitch we give is that conjectured by Bellerman and accepted by Westphal and Gevaert; but either the Greek voices must have been higher than ours or the actual pitch lower. In adapting the music for performance, MM. Fauré and Reinach have transposed it a minor third lower. Of the fourteen signs used, twelve belong to the Phrygian notation as given by Alypius; the other two, B and O, though they do not occur in the Phrygian, uniformly produce the notes G flat, and B natural or C flat wherever they occur in the other notations. It will be observed that the general key is our harmonic C minor, but the extraneous notes, D flat, A natural, and G flat occur. Of these D flat belongs to the conjunct tetrachord of the Phrygian scale. It is the B flat of the later Gregorian music. A natural is part of the chromatic genus of the Phrygian scale; G flat belongs to the Hyper-Phrygian scale, and perhaps represents a temporary modulation to this related key as described by Chappell (p. 103). With regard to the rhythm, Aristoxenus tells us that the Phrygian key is intimately connected with the Pæonic or 5-time bar, but that the 5-time rhythm gave way towards the end of the tune to the 3-time. Now the larger portions of the present Pæan are in 5-time measure, and a further fragment was found, too mutilated to allow of restoration, showing undoubted 3-time rhythm. Aristoxenus further informs us that the 5-time bar consisted of two portions of, respectively, 3 and 2 or 2 and 3-times—in other words, 5-time rhythm was then, as it is now, practically an alternation of 3 and 2-time simple bars. In performing the hymn, therefore, it will simplify matters if the conductor imagines a dotted bar line (such as we find in some modern compositions) after the third beat in each bar, and he will beat 3 and 2-time bars alternately.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

NOT long since, I quoted an extraordinary letter addressed by a clergyman to a candidate for the position of organist in his church. That was pour encourager les autres. But the pillory does not strike the clerical mind with universal terror, as appears from a communication made to another candidate, who made enquiries concerning a vacant position hardly a thousand miles from a town in which beer is brewed. I give this precious document below, suppressing names only:—

Salary, £20. Cottage, modern, three bedrooms, sitting room, living room, scullery, small garden, washhouse, cowhouse, carpenter's shop, pig-sty, and small garden. The organ, two-manual, by Walker. Services, three or four on Sundays and one on Wednesday nights, with practise (sic) after, and special occasions—e.g., chief Festivals, Saints' Days, &c. There is no opening for pupils. —— is seven miles off. Nearest station is ——, three miles. The country is beautiful, and on high ground. Services, Anglican and plain in character. Church holds 400. Choir surpliced, assisted by female voices. Population scattered, and village quiet. Position requires someone with a country trade, small means or pension. Cottage unfurnished. If you desire to continue your application, please write at once to, &c.

The only alleviating feature in this precious enumeration of duties and conditions is that the clergyman himself knows them to be absurd. "If you desire to continue your application," he writes, and there is much virtue in the "if." All the same, if there should be a carpenter, cow-keeper, or pig-keeper who can play the organ, and who loves beautiful scenery and high ground, here is a chance for him.

THE printer's boy has grossly libelled Mr. Harper Kearton. He got hold of a notice of a Concert at Oxted in which that excellent singer took part, and, seeing Mr. Kearton ascribed as "principal tenor at Westminster Abbey," the little fiend changed the word "tenor" into "terror."

HE has been at work also upon the notice of a Concert at Winsford. According to him, "To dust his glory they would tread" was "sung with much symphony" by the choir, and a certain artist delighted the audience by a "setaceous" delivery of "Honour and Arms." In another place he caused the public to be informed that an artist had played an "Etute and Ballard."

MUSICAL folk were laughing the other day at the case of the Dean and Chapter of Chester Cathedral versus Frances Williams, an elderly lady who, giving literal obedience to the injunction "Lift it up, be not afraid," raised her voice too lustily for the comfort of her fellow-worshippers. "The choristers," deposed the organist, "could hardly keep their faces while she was singing." This praiseful soul was mulcted in costs, but in the old days no notice would have been taken. A friend of mine, once in a cathedral choir, tells of another elderly lady who used to attend the services bearing, with grave and stately air, her door-key on a cushion. It is true she did not use it as a whistle, but yet another elderly lady was in the habit, when the service had reached a certain point, of expanding an umbrella, gampish in its proportions. Nobody complained of these mystic rites, but we are more particular now. Whether we are also better is a distinct question.

NEWS for the Thirteen Club! I read in an evening contemporary, "Thirteen is said by the superstitious to be an unlucky number, but it has not so proved in the case of the Portsmouth Philharmonic Society, for both the Concerts held during their thirteenth session have proved most successful." Next season the Society should give their Concerts on the 13th of the month and have thirteen items in the programme. Any Op. 13 would be a desirable acquisition.

THE Exchange and Mart wants "12 copies of Monk and Duseley's Psalter." Also "Haydn's Symphonies, Violin and Pianoforte, arranged by Murgis Clementi." What offers?

THE Pall Mall Gazette tells its readers that after Madame Albani had sung at a Roman Catholic meeting in St. James's Hall, "in acknowledgment of a kindness which she had rendered with all her smiles, Cardinal Vaughan rose in his scarlet from his presidential chair and handed her from the platform." The Pall Mall Gazette adds: "cardinals have done no such act as this little act of the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster's for some hundreds of years past." We all know that there have been some questionable persons among the "Princes of the Church," but I, for one, was not aware that their better qualities have so rarely included the courtesy of gentlemen.

"THE instrumental corps was officered entirely by brass." This expresssion has just come under my corporeal eye, and in my mind's eye I see the writer as a young and ardent volunteer, so much do our sympathies affect our thoughts and words.

JOSEPH BENNETT.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

IF ever there was an operatic impresario who deserved to be termed enterprising it is Sir Augustus Harris. In the olden, and as some persist in still calling them golden, days of Italian Opera in London, the production of a new work was an event of the season, and it was usually delayed until the closing weeks. But the present manager of Covent Garden opened his theatre on a Bank Holiday, and within his first week presented two fresh operas of the first magnitude, besides mounting standard works on every other night. Both the novelties were of great interest; the first as being the effort of a musician of the new Italian school, and one hitherto unknown here; and the other the work of a veteran, who might say of it with pride, "This is the child of my old age." Giacomo Puccini is scarcely a novice in his art, for an opera from his pen, entitled "Le Villi," was produced several years ago, though it made little impression. "Manon Lescaut," on the other hand, has been supremely successful in Italy, and to a less extent elsewhere. It required some hardihood to select a subject which had already been treated by Auber and more recently, and we may add more successfully, by Massenet. Further than this we may say that in one respect the latest version of the Abbé Prévost's literary masterpiece is a failure. Whatever may be the prevailing fashions in Italy as regards opera, we in this country have learned to consider a strong dramatic foundation essential, and the book of "Manon Lescaut" is little better than a series of disconnected scenes, the purport of which it is impossible to comprehend without previous acquaintance with the novel. At the end of the first act the frivolous heroine flies with Des Grieux in the carriage engaged by her elderly admirer, Geronte, but at the beginning of the second she is discovered as the mistress of the latter. Later on she is arrested for reasons which may be easily understood by those familiar with the French laws of the last century, but which are incomprehensible otherwise. In the fourth and last act Manon and Des Grieux are found wandering in a desert place near New Orleans, where the girl dies of fever; but why they are there, lonely and without shelter, is by no means clearly explained. Many fine operas have failed to win permanent favour in consequence of a faulty literary or dramatic substratum, and it is much to be feared that Puccini's work will have to be added to their number. Let us hasten, however, to recognise the conspicuous merit of the music, and the promise it displays of still better things to come. The composer is not as yet possessed of a wholly individual style, but what he has learned from France, and to a less extent from Wagner, he has engrafted on to what may be termed the idiosyncrasies of "Young Italy." These are fervid expression, melody of the most passionate description, and harmonic progressions sometimes very sumptuous, but at others chiefly noteworthy for breaches of the rules with regard to consecutive fifths and octaves. There are passages in this work calculated to freeze the blood of conservative musicians; but, on the other hand, it must gladly be conceded that when Puccini wishes to write sensuous love music, or to illustrate a thrilling dramatic situation, he is always equal to his task. "Manon Lescaut" is essentially a work to which a cultured amateur may listen without even looking at the stage or paying any heed to the flow of the story. In his next effort the composer should pay a little more heed to the principles of lyric drama as laid down by Wagner, without of course adopting them in their entirety. There is no serious fault to be found with the performance at Covent Garden. The representative of the frail heroine, Miss Olga Olghina, is attractive in appearance if somewhat weak in voice. Mr. Beduschi made at once a favourable impression as a tenor in the part of Des Grieux, and will in all probability prove a useful artist. Commendable service was rendered by several other new-comers, including Mr. Pini-Corsi, Mr. Arimondi, and Mr. Pelagalli-Rossetti, and the general performance was praiseworthy.

Verdi's comic opera "Falstaff" was produced in February last year at La Scala, Milan, and it saw the light at Covent Garden on the 19th ult. This may seem a long interval to young patrons of opera, but to veterans it is very brief, for in the old days we usually had to wait until an interesting new work had gone the round of the world before it reached London. Thanks to the zeal of Sir Augustus Harris, "Falstaff" is now before metropolitan amateurs, and if they do not appreciate it the fault is theirs, and cannot be laid to the charge of the composer, the manager, or the Covent Garden Company. A lengthy description of the opera was given in THE MUSICAL TIMES when it was first performed, and there is no need to recapitulate what was then said. But those who made its acquaintance for the first time on the occasion now under notice could not fail to be struck by the qualities which especially distinguish the score—namely, tunefulness and the effervescence of youth. That the latter term can with justice be applied to the effort of a composer bordering on four-score years when he penned it, may perhaps be regarded as one of the most remarkable manifestations of musical genius ever known in the history of the art; but it is nevertheless a fact that in the latest, though, we trust, not the last, opera of Guiseppe Verdi, the only fault that can possibly be found is an excess of tuneful material. One piquant melody succeeds another until the ear becomes oversatiated. The orchestra sparkles, and the voices are treated in the grateful manner which Italian composers more fully understand than those of any other nation; but there is more than this in the score of "Falstaff." The mock seriousness with which Verdi burlesques the "Credo" from his own "Otello," when the fat knight speaks slightingly of "Honour," the real seriousness in Ford's monologue on "Jealousy," and the contrapuntal skill displayed in some of the concerted movements show the hand of a master. The octogenarian musician is reported to be at work on another Shakespearian opera based on "King Lear"; but if he had finished his career with "Falstaff" he could certainly not have done it more worthily. To those who did not witness the original production at Milan, the Covent Garden performance must seem fairly satisfying, though of course it was given without the many rehearsals which are regarded abroad as essential. Mr. Pessina, in the titular part originally played by Mr. Maurel, evinced the possession of a fine baritone voice and much intelligence as an actor. Miss Giulia Ravogli, as Dame Quickly, was unexceptionable; Miss Olga Olghina as Anne Page, Miss E. Zilli as Mrs. Ford, Mr. Beduschi as Fenton, and Mr. Pini-Corsi as Ford were all highly commendable, and the orchestra (under Signor Mancinelli), the chorus, and the scenic arrangements were worthy of Covent Garden. Performances, for the most part excellent, have already been given of "Faust," "Carmen," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Pagliacca," "Orfeo," and "Philémon et Baucis." The orchestra and chorus this season are of unusually fine quality.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE Royal Choral Society concluded its labours for the season at the Albert Hall with an unusually fine performance of "Elijah," on April 26. Of the impersonation of the titular part by Mr. Andrew Black—vocally admirable and extremely effective in a dramatic sense—we have spoken on former occasions; but the gifted young Scottish baritone certainly surpassed his previous efforts on the occasion now under notice, and fairly earned the enthusiasm displayed by the immense audience. Much satisfaction was given, on the whole, by the other principal vocalists, the most prominent names being those of Mrs. Elene Eaton, Miss Clara Butt, Miss Jessie Hudlestone, and Mr. Edward Lloyd. The choruses were rendered with truly magnificent power and precision under the bâton of Sir Joseph Barnby.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

THE engagement of M. Paderewski at the Concert of the 2nd ult. of course resulted in an overflowing attendance at the Queen's Hall. By general desire the most popular pianist of the day gave his piquant Polish Fantasia, which seems to be more and more liked at each successive hearing. He was in splendid form, and after several recalls played Mendelssohn's "Lied ohne Worte," Adagio in F, No. 22, as an encore. Mr. Edward German's Norwich Symphony in A minor, No. 2, the merits of which have been fully discussed at previous performances, was splendidly interpreted, as were Beethoven's "Egmont" and Mendelssohn's "Meerestille" Overtures. Mr. Oudin was extremely artistic in songs by Tschaikowsky and César Franck, and Dr. A. C. Mackenzie conducted throughout with conspicuous ability.

There was an equally large audience at the fifth Concert, on the 24th ult., the principal attraction at this being the re-appearance of the justly popular Scandinavian pianist, conductor, and composer, Dr. Edvard Grieg, after several years' absence from this country. On the present occasion he was represented in the second and third of the capacities named. Three movements from some incidental music to Björnsen's tragedy "Sigurd Jorsalfar" were introduced for the first time in England. They consist of a Vorspiel, an Intermezzo, and a Huldigungsmarsch. As no quotations were given in the programme book, we can only give utterance to the general impressions derived by the performance, which were that the music is in every way worthy of Grieg. The last is the most elaborate, and, on the whole, the finest movement; but in the first and second we find plenty of characteristic touches in melody and orchestration, the Intermezzo, illustrating the dream of the unhappy heroine Borghild, reminding the listener of the "Death of Aase," from the "Peer Gynt" Suite, No. 1. The composer had a magnificent reception, and at the conclusion of the performance was recalled several times. It is needless to add that his work received the fullest possible justice at the hands of the Philharmonic orchestra. There were two other novelties in the programme, both of them for pianoforte and orchestra, introduced by Madame Sophie Menter. The first was a Fantaisie de Concert in G, by Tschaikowsky. This, in its complete form, consists of two extended movements, but the second, entitled "Contrastes," was omitted on this occasion, and the first, Quasi Rondo, was extended by a lengthy Coda, written, we may suppose, for occasions when the movement is given without its companion. It is virtuoso music pure and simple, and Madame Sophie Menter interpreted it in her customary powerful and brilliant fashion. A Fantaisie in F minor and major from her own pen, but orchestrated by Tschaikowsky, might pass very well for a Rhapsody by Liszt. It is a bright and genial work, and greatly pleased the audience. An excellent performance of Beethoven's Symphony in F (No. 8) was secured, under the direction of Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, and the Concert ended with the Scherzo and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. Miss Landi's rendering of songs by Gluck, Saint-Saëns, and Massenet gained deserved applause.

STATE OPENING OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

ON the 2nd ult. the new home of the Royal College of Music was formally opened by the Prince of Wales on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen. The edifice is of red brick, with bands and dressings of Weldon stone, and occupies the portion of the ground immediately abutting on the Prince Consort Road. The style is Renaissance, freely treated. The cost of the building has been defrayed by a sum of £45,000, munificently presented to the Prince of Wales for the purpose by Mr. Samson Fox, M.Inst.C.E., of Leeds, in 1891. The decorations of the entrance hall have been carried out at Mr. Fox's cost by a further donation of £1,000. The College has been erected from the designs of Sir A. W. Blomfield, A.R.A., by Mr. Thompson, of Peterborough, on a plot of ground granted to the College at a nominal rent by the Royal Commissioners of 1851. It is divided into two wings, one for the male and the other for the female pupils. These have separate entrances, staircases, and lifts, but are connected on each floor except the top by a corridor running from end to end of the building. The main entrance for the public is in the centre, leading into an entrance hall. At the back, space has been left for the erection of a theatre and concert-room, as well as for other additions as the number of pupils increases. The theatre will, it is hoped, be erected at no distant date. It will be planned to serve also for a lecture room and for orchestral concerts, and will be placed immediately at the back of the central offices on the spot now occupied by the temporary hall, with ample means of easy and direct access and exit by the front entrances. On the top floor is a noble room running nearly the whole length of the building, which it is hoped to occupy shortly with a collection of musical objects, a library, and other things. In a room behind the temporary hall is the very valuable and unique Donaldson Museum of historical musical instruments formed by Mr. George Donaldson, and presented by him to the Prince of Wales for the permanent use of the College. Three of the organs have been specially built by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield, and are blown by electric motors supplied by Messrs. Bergtheil and Young. Other organs will be added as occasion requires.

The whole length of the road in front of the College was decorated with masts, flags, and festoons of evergreens. The guests, assembled in the temporary hall, included the most eminent representatives of art, science, literature, and the diplomatic body, many of Her Majesty's ministers, and a host of the most distinguished members of every profession. The scene was of exceptional brilliancy, as only uniforms, robes, levée and evening dress were worn. At 12 o'clock the Royal party arrived, the Prince receiving from the hands of Mr. Samson Fox a richly chased golden key, with which he opened the main door. A procession was then formed, which included the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Princesses Victoria and Maud, the Duke and Duchess of York, Princess Christian, the Duke of Cambridge, Princess Henry of Battenberg, the Marchioness of Lorne, the Duchesses of Connaught and Albany, and the Duke and Duchess of Teck. As the procession moved towards the daïs the orchestra, under Professor Stanford, played Gluck's March from "Alceste," and the Royal party being seated the Overture to "Die Meistersinger" was played. Mr. Samson Fox then read an address to the Prince on behalf of the Council, and his Royal Highness having replied, the "Ode to Music" written specially by Mr. Swinburne (printed in our issue of January, 1893), and set to music by Mr. Charles Wood, formerly Morley Scholar at the College, was performed under the composer's direction. The solo was well sung by Miss Una Bruckshaw, and the work gave a very favourable impression of the young musician's skill and training. It was followed by "God save the Queen," the first verse of which was sung by Madame Albani. As the royal visitors and their suite moved away the orchestra played an arrangement, by Mr. Manns, of Schubert's Marche Militaire in D.

THE BACH CHOIR.

SOME interesting Motets by such old masters as Palestrina, Orlando di Lasso, and Vittoria were given in Queen's Hall on the 8th ult., at the final Concert of the season of this choir. The six-part "Assumpta est Maria" and five-part "Exultate Deo" of the first-named composer constituted striking examples of the unaccompanied part-music of a far back age. The two other musicians were equally well represented, and the performance by the choir was, in each case, solid, even, and vigorous. Heinrich Schütz's bass solo, "David's Lament," with accompaniment for four trombones and organ, made as deep an impression upon the audience as at the Norwich Festival and elsewhere. Another somewhat similar piece for four trombones, the organ being silent, was the "Equali" of Beethoven, with Messrs. G. Case, C. Hadfield, C. Geard, and J. Matt as the interpreters. The Chaconne of Bach was rendered with force, breadth, and keen regard to expression by M. Achille Rivarde, an able violinist recently arrived in England, and who, by firm and correct execution, has already won many friends. The Choral Ode by Dr. Hubert Parry, "Blest Pair of Sirens," was rendered with the efficiency due to a piece quite able to hold its own against other compositions of kindred nature, and Mr. David Bispham successfully gave the "Cavalier Songs" of Professor Stanford, who conducted with unfailing judgment. At this Concert was used a bass trombone with the new aluminium slide, made by patent process, the joint invention of George Case and D. J. Blaikley. This improvement is of the very greatest importance to the slide trombones of the modern orchestra. The moveable part of the slide is only one-third the weight of that made of other metals. The aluminium does not deposit verdigris, and when warmed up to a certain temperature while playing does not as readily cool down as other metals would. The instrument, therefore, does not vary in pitch—a great consideration when it is remembered that trombones have many bars' rest, and sometimes whole movements in which they do not play.

WAGNER CONCERTS.

PERFORMANCES composed mainly or entirely of selections from the Bayreuth master's music-dramas are apparently increasing in popularity in the concert-room, and the Queen's Hall has already become a favourite medium for this somewhat singular form of entertainment. The term singular is not inappropriate, because it was at first an important clause in the Wagnerian creed that his works were written for the stage and should not be presented apart from their proper scenic accessories. But rightly or wrongly, amateurs have taken kindly to excerpts from these strangely original works in the concert-room, and the practice of giving entire acts is now meeting with much favour, not only in London, but in provincial musical centres. We have at present to record briefly two performances of this nature, under the direction of Mr. F. H. Cowen. The first took place on Saturday, April 28, when a specially effective rendering was given of the third act of "Lohengrin," without any of the cuts which are regarded as necessary at Covent Garden and elsewhere. Miss Ella Russell, Miss W. Ludlam, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Bispham constituted an admirable quartet, and if the choir and orchestra were not faultless their work was, on the whole, well done. On the following Saturday the whole of the third act of "Tannhäuser" went equally well, the chorus indeed showing some improvement. Miss Ella Russell, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Andrew Black were unexceptionable in the music of Elizabeth, Tannhäuser, and Wolfram respectively. Of the minor selections at both Concerts there is no occasion to speak.

HERR MOTTL'S CONCERTS.

ON the anniversary of Wagner's birth (May 22) Mr. Mottl gave his second Concert at Queen's Hall before a large and "fashionable" audience. On this occasion a better opportunity was afforded of judging his qualities as an "all-round" Conductor, inasmuch as, in spite of the anniversary, the programme was not confined to the music of Richard Wagner, as on the former occasion. Only its second part was so constituted, its first containing Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, extracts from the "Roméo and Juliette" Symphony of Berlioz, and the same master's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." Interest naturally centred on the C minor, concerning which it may be said at once that a large amount of justice was done to its transcendent merits. In the opening Allegro the orchestral ensemble was not always quite perfect, and the Conductor's desire to "make points" rather detracted from the impulse and the unity which in so marked a degree characterise this movement; but for all that followed we have nothing but praise. The slow movement was played with that delightful freedom of time and declamatory power, that careful attention to the phrase-groups rather than the time-beats that, when controlled by intelligence and a keen sense of rhythm, mark the difference between a real conductor and a mere beater of time, and which, though rare with conductors, is especially so with players, of Beethoven, most of whom seem to regard his music as terpsichorean rather than dramatic or lyrical. In the second part were the Introduction to Act III. of "Die Meistersinger" and Hans Sachs's Monologue, sung with admirable effect by Mr. David Bispham; two pieces from "Götterdämmerung," the Siegfried Idyll, and the beautiful Huldigungsmarsch.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

AN unusually busy season of these performances is now fairly at an end, but we have several to note this month. The first was the Stock Exchange Society's performance on April 24, when a remarkably interesting programme was presented, brief record of which, however, must suffice. The most familiar pieces were Mozart's beautiful Symphony in E flat, a selection from Sir Arthur Sullivan's music to "The Tempest," and Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor. In all of these Mr. George Kitchin's "bulls and bears" acquitted themselves extremely well. There were two Overtures new to London in the programme, the first being the picturesque prelude to the late Sir Robert Stewart's cantata "The Eve of St. John," which was performed at the Crystal Palace a few years since. The title of Mr. Learmont Drysdale's Overture, "Herondian," is taken from a glen in the Scottish Lowlands, and is full of characteristic phraseology, the only fault being undue elaboration in the details. Miss Torrens-Johnson made a favourable impression in the solo part of the Beethoven Concerto, as did Miss Jeanne Istella, a young soprano vocalist. The male-voice choir rendered justice to some part-songs, but seemed rather overweighted in Schubert's fine though sombre "Song of the Spirits over the Waters."

On the following evening there were two Concerts. The Westminster Orchestral Society's programme was, in the main, familiar, but included Mr. Barclay Jones's clever Overture in C minor, noticed when it was first produced at the Crystal Palace. This was well directed by the composer; the rest of the Concert was ably conducted by Mr. Stewart Macpherson, and included Mozart's Symphony in G minor and Henselt's Pianoforte Concerto in F minor, the very arduous solo part in which was brilliantly played by Miss Sybil Palliser. Vocal excerpts were contributed with effect by Miss Greta Williams and Mr. H. L. Thomas.

Little was done at the Concert of the Royal Amateur Society at the Queen's Hall to demand reference. Madame Sophie Menter played the solo part in the orchestral version of Chopin's Polonaise Brilliante in E flat (Op. 22) with much fluency and vigour, and a selection from Rossini's neglected masterpiece "William Tell" was welcome, ably rendered as it was by Mr. George Mount's experienced orchestra, the Queen's Hall Choral Society, and Miss Biancoli, Miss Minnie Price, Mr. Iver McKay, Mr. G. Sandbrook, and Mr. A. G. Puttick in the solo parts.

Unusual merit, alike in the selection and the execution of the programme, was shown at the Concert of the Strolling Players, on the 3rd ult., at the Queen's Hall. Reference has already been made to the promise evinced by Mr. R. H. Walthew as a composer. He was represented on this occasion by a new Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, in which he not only proved the value of the teaching he has received at the hands of Professor Villiers Stanford and Dr. Hubert Parry at the Royal College of Music, but also his possession of some individuality of style. Mr. Walthew played the solo part in his clever work extremely well. Mr. Norfolk Megone's well drilled players rendered a large measure of justice to the "Lohengrin" Prelude, Beethoven's Symphony in F (No. 8), and Massenet's Suite, "Scènes Alsaciennes." Very pleasing vocal assistance was given by Madame Fanny Moody and Mr. Braxton Smith.

MR. MANNS'S BENEFIT CONCERT.

FOR his annual Benefit Concert, held on April 28, the veteran Conductor of the Crystal Palace Concerts was not only assisted by a number of distinguished artists, but had arranged a programme containing two important orchestral novelties, of which the most remarkable was Dvorák's "In der Natur," being the first section of the triple Overture, of which the remaining numbers—"Carnival" and "Othello"—had been introduced at one of the Saturday Concerts earlier in the season. True to its name, "In der Natur" is an eloquent panegyric in the language of the orchestra of the delights of the country. It is programme music in the same sense as Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, and follows the memorable principles laid down by Beethoven himself when he said that works of this sort should express feeling rather than attempt to paint. The Overture is full of vivid colour and sunshine, and charms the hearer alike by its wealth of melody and rhythmical grace. Another brilliant work, though of a very different character, heard for the first time in London on this occasion, was M. Saint-Saëns's Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra, "Africa," which records the impression of the man of the world rather than the man of feeling. It is, however, a sparkling work, orchestrated with great brilliancy, and was played with unexpected brio by Miss Fanny Davies. Miss Rina Allerton, a niece of Mr. Manns, made a favourable impression by her singing of Grieg's "Solvejg's Lied," and Miss Marie Brema introduced two decidedly clever songs by Mr. A. Webber. Mr. Andrew Black contributed the ever-welcome "O ruddier than the cherry" and an Aria by Weber, with his wonted vigour and success, and the Crystal Palace Choir were heard in Schubert's flowing version of the 23rd Psalm and a selection from the last act of the "Meistersinger." Lady Hallé played Spohr's "Scena Cantante" in her best style, and the programme was completed by Beethoven's Symphony in A (No. 7). Mr. Manns, who was greeted with great enthusiasm from beginning to end of the Concert, was presented after the performance of the Symphony with numerous floral tributes.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

THOSE who declared that the present season would show a falling off in the number of these performances must, by this time, have received a forcible reminder of the proverb "Never prophesy unless you know," as pianists are arriving in battalions, and the briefest possible record of their efforts must suffice on the present occasion. On April 26 Miss Katie Leonard, a child of eight years, and a pupil of Mr. F. Berger, displayed striking natural ability at the Steinway Hall; but the little girl's gifts should be cultivated quietly at home and not prematurely forced in the concert-room.

Passing over several Recitals, which at this busy season of the year could not expect to receive due attention, we come to that which was given on the 5th ult. by Mr. Sapellnikoff at St James's Hall, at which the gifted young Russian artist and virtuoso displayed his mastery over the keyboard in Beethoven's Sonata in F minor (Op. 57) and in several selections from the repertory of Chopin. It should not be forgotten that he was a pupil of Madame Sophie Menter, and mistress and scholar were heard to the fullest advantage in a duet for two pianofortes, by Reinecke, owing to their agreement in technique and expression.

On the same afternoon Madame Roger-Miclos, a brilliant French pianist, who first appeared in London four years ago, gave a Recital at the Princes' Hall, and evinced the possession of remarkable manipulative abilities in Beethoven's Sonata in C sharp minor (Op. 27, No. 2), generally known here as the "Moonlight"; Schumann's "Carnaval," and other pieces by Schubert, Chopin, Grieg, Liszt, and Rubinstein. Madame Roger-Miclos may not be a very sympathetic, but she is certainly a brilliant and intelligent artist.

Mr. Joseph Hofmann has made his re-appearance after an advisable period of repose of several years, and now may be regarded as an artist rather than a prodigy. He has studied under Rubinstein, and at his three Recitals at St. James's Hall on Saturdays, the 5th, 12th, and 19th ult., clearly showed the influence of his master, though without slavish imitation. He now seems equally at home in the classical and romantic schools, and his rendering of various works of large calibre, as well as of trifling pieces, was marked generally by vivid imagination and brilliant technique. Mr. Risler, who gave Recitals at the Princes' Hall on the 17th and 23rd ult., is a very able performer, and he should, if possible, re-visit us at a less busy period. The same advice may be given to Mr. Masbach, who played in a sound and conscientious style at his Recital in St. James's Hall on the 22nd ult., and to Mr. Sevadjean, who performed to well-nigh empty benches in the same room on the 24th ult.

AMSTERDAM À CAPPELLA CHOIR.

A notable musical event of the last month was the visit to London of the Amsterdam à Cappella Choir, who sing the music of the early Netherlands school and composers, immediately preceding and contemporary with the famous Palestrina, with remarkable precision and attention to detail. One effect of the Papal sanction given to the compositions of Palestrina was to cause the writings of many other composers to be condemned, and thus much clever music was consigned to undeserved oblivion. It is this music which Mr. Daniel de Lange, the Conductor of the choir, has made his especial study, and the performance of which forms the chief claim of his forces to public attention. The choir is a mixed one of the usual kind, and consists of twenty voices, well balanced and of good quality, but somewhat wanting in that refinement which characterises the best singing of our choral societies. At their opening Concert on the 15th ult., in St. Martin's Town Hall, the most remarkable performances were a "Kyrie et Christe," by Ockeghem; an "Agnus Dei," by Obrecht, set as a trio for alto, tenor, and bass; a very impressive setting of the "Et incarnatus est," by Josquin des Près; and a broad and vigorous Cantio Sacra, by Sweelinck. The second part of the programme was devoted to secular pieces, of which the most noteworthy were a quaint and charming "Petite Camusette," by Josquin des Près; a quartet, "Entre vous filles," by Clemens non Papa; and a gay and sprightly trio, "Je ne fus jamais si ayse," by Pierre Certon. All these were sung entirely unaccompanied, and with a mastery over their exceptional contrapuntal difficulties and appropriateness of expression that revivified the old music in a most delightful manner. Our choral societies might, with advantage, turn their attention to these early masters, many of whose compositions have never been surpassed in contrapuntal ingenuity and expression.

MRS. HENSCHEL'S VOCAL RECITAL.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel's first of two Vocal Recitals, given on the 17th ult., in the small Queen's Hall, was distinguished by that high class character, both of the music selected and its performance, which has long made these Concerts so enjoyable. The most important work presented was Mr. Henschel's exceedingly clever and characteristic Russian Vocal Quartets (Op. 51), which were sung with delightful finish and charming expression by the Concert-givers, assisted by Miss Janson and Mr. Shakespeare. The programme also contained violin pieces by Miss Frida Scotta, who is also engaged for the next Recital.

MR. DOLMETSCH'S RECITAL.

The attractive series of Concerts of Antient Music given by Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch at his house at Dulwich were concluded on the 22nd ult., the three last programmes being respectively devoted to early French composers, Handel, and J. S. Bach. The evening given to French writers included the performance of many pieces of great antiquarian interest. Such were "A little Fantesie for the tunying of the Lute," by Adrian Le Roy, published in 1570, and a Prelude for the same instrument from "Le Secret des Muses," by Nicolas Valet, published in 1618. Much interest was also attached to the music for viols da gamba by the famous viol player, Marin Marais, born in Paris in 1656. Pieces by Couperin and Rameau, and dainty songs by De la Barre and Du Fresny completed a unique programme. The Handel selection attracted a large audience and presented many interesting features, amongst which may be mentioned a very early effort of the master in the shape of a Sonata for the flute, violin, violoncello, and harpsichord (Op. 2, No. 1), and the Suite de Pièces for the harpsichord (No. 5, in E), which includes the well-known "Harmonious Blacksmith" air and variations, the origin of the said air being traced by Mr. Dolmetsch to Spanish sources. Two excerpts from the "St. Matthew" Passion music were introduced in the selection on the Bach evening—viz., the aria for a bass voice, "Komm, süsses Kreuz" ("Come, healing cross"), with viola da gamba obbligato, and the aria for an alto voice, "Erbarme dich mein Gott" ("Have mercy, Lord, on me"). A Prelude in C minor for the lute and the Prelude and Fugue (No. 21) in B flat for the clavichord are also worthy of mention. Great credit is due to Mr. Dolmetsch for having so successfully aroused interest in so much that is good to remember. The performances must have been a revelation to many, and even those for whom the old music possessed but little musical charm must have been impressed with the great skill of our forefathers who, with such comparatively small means, accomplished so much.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

It is not often that the attainment of a seventieth year of existence is associated with such unmistakable signs of vigour and promise of life as were shown at Queen's Hall on the 17th ult., when the Royal Academy of Music gave a commemoration Concert to celebrate this interesting point in its brilliant and successful career. The list of composers represented included Sterndale Bennett, G. A. and W. Macfarren, Arthur Sullivan, Joseph Barnby, Goring Thomas, E. German, Maude V. White, F. Corder, and, of course, Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, who conducted the Concert. This list, however inadequately representing the number of Royal Academy students whose compositions have brought honour to their Alma Mater and to themselves, was sufficient to make good the claims of this Institution to the hearty congratulations of all friends of music. The performers also, soloists, choir, and orchestra, were all, with the exception of a few wind instrument players, past or present students, and as among these figured such names as Agnes Zimmermann, Mary Davies, Clara Samuell, Hilda Wilson, William Shakespeare, Arthur Oswald—to name but the most eminent—the representative power of the programme is sufficiently obvious. The last piece on the programme was Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's new nautical Overture, entitled "Britannia." This delightfully humorous and brilliantly clever work is dedicated to the Duke of Coburg—President of the Royal Academy, who graced the Concert with his presence—and had been composed specially for the occasion. It should take high rank among modern orchestral works, for it possesses the qualities that make for popularity united to those that command the admiration of mere musicians. It is constructed with wonderful ingenuity and command of contrapuntal and orchestral resource; yet it is bright, tuneful, full of life and vigour, and as clear as an Italian landscape. How well the composer must have learnt Pope's famous lesson: "True ease in writing comes from art, not chance, as those move easiest who have learnt to dance!" Dr. Mackenzie has not only learnt to dance, but to dance in fetters, and quite lightly too. The book of words contained no analysis of the work, but attentive listeners recognised, with much amusement, that in addition to "first" and "second" subjects of great charm, the thematic material of the Overture includes snatches of "Rule, Britannia," intoned with more than usual pomposity, and scoffed at, as it were, by the hornpipe, which dances derisively around in the most comical way possible. The work is to be heard shortly at a Philharmonic Concert.

Under the able direction of Mr. G. H. Betjemann, the students of the Operatic Class gave performances of "Philémon et Baucis" (in English—Mr. Joseph Bennett's translation being used) and "Pagliacci" (in Italian) on the 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th ult. The performances not being public, criticism is scarcely called for; but it may be said that much individual and collective merit was shown, a distinct improvement on previous years being perceptible in the acting and stage "business" generally of both principals and chorus. The chief parts were sustained by Misses L. Redfern, J. E. Wilson, L. Burden, L. Speight, Kate Alston, M. Bailey, and Mrs. Thorpe-Davis; Messrs. Philip Brozel, R. Brophy, J. W. Foster, C. Clements, A. Appleby, A. Henning, and T. M. James. Of these Mr. Brozel deserves special commendation for a really excellent performance of the difficult part of Canio in "Pagliacci." This young artist should make a position. Both as a singer and an actor he shows the true dramatic instinct—that is, alas! so rare.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC LECTURES.

At the Royal Academy on April 25 and the 9th ult., Mr. E. F. Jacques lectured on the "Art of Teaching," and drew attention to many important facts, the consideration of which is peculiarly appropriate at this period, when the registration of teachers is occupying so much attention in the musical world. The lecturer drew a graphic picture of the ideal teacher according to the latest lights thrown upon the important subject by modern science and research. This teacher must not only be master of the particular branch of art a knowledge of which it is his duty to impart to his pupils, but he should possess a far-reaching acquaintance with all other arts and the scientific basis upon which they are built, and, above all, he must be able to recognise the peculiar mental idiosyncrasies of each pupil, and to adopt a system that most quickly appeals to, and is calculated to most permanently impress the mind of each. He must be able to distinguish between inability to comprehend and mental laziness, between want of self confidence and vanity, to check carelessness, to show the pupil his ignorance without hurting his feelings, and to praise judiciously. In a word, to convince the pupil that his master is his best friend and most reliable authority, to whom he can refer concerning the subject he is studying. The chief characteristic of a born teacher was happily defined as "an over-mastering desire to help or advise others," while that of the made teacher as "a dislike for teaching in itself save under especial circumstances." Another important truth, one unfortunately little realised, but on this occasion clearly shown, was that the power of acquiring knowledge was entirely different from the faculty to impart what was known. In the one case the receptive faculties were employed, in the other the sympathetic and explanatory powers were called into play, and the employment necessitated of almost as many different methods as there were differences in the ages and brains of the pupils addressed. Perhaps the most important part of the discourses were those in which reliability of memory and a good critical faculty were shown to be largely dependent upon the habitual cultivation of observation and discrimination, facts that can scarcely be too much impressed upon all students. In conclusion, the lecturer gave the names and particulars of various books from which much valuable knowledge bearing on the art of teaching could be acquired.

Mr. F. Corder began, on the 16th ult., a series of lectures on the "Musical Treatment of the Faust Legend," a fascinating subject to all art students and one to which the lecturer has evidently devoted much time and study. Mr. Corder commenced his history of the legend by reference to a collection of mediæval legends of sorcery compiled in 1587 by an unknown author in the form of a biography, the hero being one John Faust, a doctor of theology, who was, owing to his learning and knowledge, commonly accredited with having intercourse with the Powers of Evil. The following is a literal translation of the title of this book: "The History of Dr. Johann Faust, the far-famed Magician and Necromancer. How he bound himself to belong to the Devil at a certain time, and what marvellous Adventures he made and went through in the meanwhile until he at last received his well-deserved Reward. Mostly compiled from his own Writings and published for an awful Instance, a fearful Example, and an earnest Warning to all arrogant, light-minded, and godless Men. James III. Submit yourselves therefore to God. Resist the Devil and he will flee from you. Cum gratia et Privilegio. Imprinted at Frankfort-on-the-Main by Johann Speig, 1587." This volume, which was speedily translated into English, French, Dutch, and Flemish, was followed by a sequel known as the "Wagner-buch," Wagner being Dr. Faust's servant. The lecturer read several interesting and, in many instances, most amusing extracts from these works and others to which they gave rise, down to the masterly treatment which the subject received from Goethe, which, having been begun in 1774, was published in its present form in 1806. Long before Goethe began writing on the legend the story was presented in various dramatic forms, some of which were furnished with incidental music. One of the earliest dramatic versions was called "The Necromancer; or Harlequin Doctor Faustus," and was performed at the Theatre Royal in Lincoln's Inn Fields in 1731. It was mostly musical, but the composer of the music was unknown.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.

Professor Bridge's Lecture at the Royal Institution on "Mozart as a Teacher" attracted a numerous and appreciative audience. The Professor is the happy possessor of the exercises given by Mozart to Thomas Attwood, and the corrections, which in many instances amount to the re-writing of whole passages, show in a most interesting manner not only the great master's methods of working and idiosyncrasies of style, but also his great conscientiousness and ability as a teacher. Judging by the comments written on the pages of the exercises, Attwood would appear to have frequently left the exercises with Mozart for correction at the latter's leisure. The remarks are written in Italian, German, and English, and are not always complimentary. Indeed, in one instance Mozart has written "You are an ass," and this, apparently to impress it the more, in English. That this opinion was not permanent in the master's mind is, however, proved by the care and praise bestowed on subsequent exercises. Several of these most happily show how a few touches of genius can convert the commonplace into the delightful, dull or faulty passages by Attwood often being made charming by a few alterations by Mozart. These effects were instructively illustrated by the professor, who played several examples of Attwood's writings, explaining how they had been improved by Mozart. Through the kindness of Messrs. Novello, fac-simile copies of some of the exercises, with their corrections, which appeared in the "Mozart" Supplement of The Musical Times, were given to the audience. These examples were of special interest to antiquaries and collectors of original musical manuscripts, as they showed the peculiar manner in which the master made the bass clef and the brace of the stave.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

Facts and figures reigned supreme at last month's meeting of the members of the Musical Association, when Mr. D. J. Blaikley read an erudite paper on the notes of the trumpet scale. After drawing attention to the fact commonly ignored that the harmonic scale was only one of nature's scales, the others being enharmonic, the lecturer expressed his opinion that it was of the greatest importance to students of acoustics to keep in view the great natural law that the wave of every powerful vibration departs from the simple pendular form, and that the resulting vibration is that due to the natural harmonic partials sounding with their prime. The lecturer then went into figures, and showed those who could follow him that only by strained theory could our subdominant be regarded as a substitute for the eleventh harmonic. The lecturer said there was no difficulty in finding any note of the diatonic scale in the harmonic series if one gave up the idea of the tonic being the generator of the scale, and adopted the subdominant as the generator. Perhaps the most interesting fact commented upon was that one of the ancient Egyptian flutes found by Mr. Flinders Petrie, gave a fourth which was divided exactly as was the fourth from the ninth to the twelfth harmonics. This would suggest that these intervals had been adopted from nature's scale, and, if so, would support the theory that the use of pipes had preceded that of stretched strings as musical instruments.

GRESHAM LECTURES.

THE Easter term of the Gresham College Free Lectures on Music were given by Professor Bridge, as on previous occasions, in the large hall of the City of London School. The lecturer, who would seem as fertile in providing subjects as he is happy in their treatment, took for his first discourse the life and work of Pelham Humfrey; and very interesting and instructive did the Lecture prove. The Professor showed that the old contrapuntal school practically came to an end with the death of Orlando Gibbons in 1625, and that to Humfrey was greatly attributable the acceptance and popularity of the lighter and more expressive style which came from Italy and France. With this style he had become imbued during his studies under Lulli in France, whither he had been sent in 1664 by Charles II. to complete his musical education, and from whence he returned in 1667. Attention was also drawn to the fact of the great influence he must have exercised over the musical genius of Henry Purcell, who was a boy in his choir, and one who was doubtless an eager listener to his master's "new musick." With characteristic thoroughness the Professor had traced Humfrey's ancestors, by means of his armorial bearings discovered in an old work entitled "Monumenta Westmonasteriensia," to an old Northamptonshire family.

The musical illustrations at this Lecture, which were admirably executed by Mr. E. G. Bell, Mr. W. Fell, and choirboys from Westminster Abbey, included the 51st Psalm referred to above, a remarkably expressive setting considering the period of its composition and the age of its composer; and, to the present generation, the first performance of an interesting anthem, "I will alway give thanks," written by Humfrey, Blow, and Turner in combination when they were respectively aged seventeen, sixteen, and thirteen, and called the "Club Anthem." Examples of Humfrey's dramatic perception were also shown in songs, entitled "Cheer up, my mates," "A Storme," and Desdemona's song from "Othello." These distinctly contradicted Dr. Burney's criticism that Humfrey's music contained "nothing ingenuous, graceful, nor solemn," but in place of it "inspired languor and vulgar pertness."

At the second and third Lectures the Professor continued his admirable history of the string quartet. The developments effected by the German school were clearly shown by performances of excerpts from the writings of Thomas Baltzar, Johann Jacob Walther, Heinrich J. Franz von Biber, Johann Schenck, Reinhard Keiser, and Auguste G. Muffat. Baltzar came to England in 1630 and did much to bring about the change from viols to violins here. He apparently introduced the change of position of the hand, although he did not seem to have gone beyond the third position. Walther, however, went farther in this respect, and chiefly won his reputation by his imitative effects. This was amusingly shown by the performance of a Serenata, which contained imitations of a band of violins, organ, tremolante, chitarronne, lyra tedesco, harp, bagpipes, and two trumpets. In the midst of these virtuosi effects there however occurred an Andante of great charm in the style of Corelli. Biber's superior style was well shown in a Sonata in C minor. He seems to have been the first to have adopted various systems of tuning, one of them being A, D, A, D. A Minuet from the opera "Claudius," by Keiser, plainly indicated the source from whence Handel had derived the Minuet from the Overture to "Samson," and an air by Muffat had evidently formed the basis of the March in Handel's "Judas Maccabæus."

The Italian and French influences in the growth of the string quartet were shown by reference to the writings of Battista Vitali, who held an important position in the development of the sonata form; Guiseppe Torelli, said to have invented the concerto form; Antonio Vivaldi, whose works were so greatly admired and studied by J. S. Bach; Battista Somis, who was important through his pupils Giardini, Chiabran, Léclair, and Pugnani; Geminiani, who came to England in 1714 and in 1740 published his interesting work, the "Art of Playing the Violin," in which he gives the important direction that the chin should be placed on the left-hand side of the tail-piece; F. M. Veracini, who exercised so great an influence on Tartini; Benedetto Marcello, chiefly remembered by his church music, and Jean M. Léclair, remarkable for his fondness for double stopping, which he employed for whole movements. A movement from a Sonata by the last-named showed from whence Handel had derived the "Pastoral Symphony" in "The Messiah." The examples were excellently played by Miss Lillian M. Wright, Miss E. Dixon, and Messrs. Hopkinson, A. Hobday, and Werge, under the direction of Mr. J. E. Borland.

The most attractive Lecture of this series was, however, the last, which was attended by over 600 people. The subject was the history and contents of Mace's "Musick's Monument," a book almost as entertaining as "Pepys' Diary." Mace was born in 1613, and as he lived to a great age (supposed to be ninety) and during an important transitional stage of music, his remarks are of great historical value. He was a lover of the old contrapuntal school, and lamented the change from viols to "scolding violins." The first part of his book treats of church music; strenuously advises the general adoption of organs, and speaks enthusiastically of "the most excellent, large, plump, lusty, full-speaking organ" in York Minster. In the second part he treats lovingly of lutes, and recommends their being kept between the blanket and the rug of a constantly-used bed, though he cautions his readers to take care that "no one sit down on the bed, by which I have known good lutes to be ruined." The third part is devoted to the "generous viol," and gives an interesting account of music and composers for this family of instruments. The opinions of the enthusiastic writer were happily enforced by the examples of the music he referred to being played and accompanied by Mr. and Miss Dolmetsch upon fine specimens of the instruments which the old musician loved so well. In conclusion, the Professor truly said that all must admire the thoroughness and enthusiasm of the old man and regret that his worldly success was not greater, for he lived and died a poor man. But he did not live a useless life. His book was not "Musick's" but Mace's "Monument."

MR. E. PROUT ON HANDEL.

MR. PROUT'S Lecture on Handel, entitled "The Grand Old Robber," delivered before the Incorporated Society of Musicians on the 12th ult., at the Royal Academy of Music, was of that disturbing nature which characterises the present utterances of many modern searchers after truth. For a long time past Handel's indebtedness to various composers has been gradually becoming more and more patent, but nothing so sweeping and unanswerable has hitherto been expressed as on this occasion. After drawing a distinction between plagiarism and unconscious reminiscence, such as that suggested by the air of Mendelssohn's "If with all your hearts" and Schumann's "Schlummerlied," Dr. Crotch's list was quoted, which consists of twenty-nine eminent composers, from Josquin des Près to Hummel, to which is added a significant "&c.," from whom Handel "translated" portions of their works to those of his own. Mr. Prout then produced a copy of a Serenetta for two orchestras by Alessandro Stradella, in which the music almost note for note was formed of the choruses, "He spake the word," the "Hailstone" chorus, and other numbers of the first part of "Israel in Egypt." For the second part of this work Handel was shown to have stolen still more largely, in this case from a Magnificat written about 1690 by Erba. The "Dettingen" Te Deum contained whole numbers taken bodily from a Te Deum by Urio; "Saul" and "Theodora," favourite works of Handel, both displayed a similar method, and recent researches in the Fitzwilliam Library have revealed that Handel had stolen for "Time and Truth" from an unpublished work by Graun. In fact, the lecturer said the more he studied the matter, the less he felt sure what was Handel's and what was not. No one in the whole range of composers had robbed in such a wholesale and unprincipled manner as this dear old boy had done; for with all his faults, and after forty years' acquaintance with his works, he "loved him still." This utter want of artistic morality was the more astonishing because we knew him to have been a scrupulously upright man in every other respect. In conclusion, Mr. Prout assured his listeners that his object in having taken this subject was not to disparage Handel but that they might understand the true nature of the old master's "borrowings."

M. PILTAN ON SINGING.

M. Anatole Piltan was honoured by a large and representative gathering at the Royal Academy of Music on Sunday afternoon, the 13th ult., when he explained the result of his experiments on the movements of the respiratory organs with special regard to their action during singing. The lecturer began by saying that the comparison so often made between the vocal chords and the reeds of an organ was misleading. Organ reeds required the same pressure of air for notes of high or low pitch, whereas the vocal chords required variable air pressure according to the pitch of the note sung. The lecturer also denied that any just inferences could be drawn from experiments made upon the larynx of a dead body, or from the various speaking machines that had been made. Neither could the action of the vocal chords be compared to the lips when applied to the trumpet, as in all wind instruments it was the length of the tube that determined the pitch of the sound, and no corresponding variation to any appreciable extent could be made by the singer in the resonant cavities of the head. Vocal pitch depended upon the expansion of compressed air and the elevation and action of the larynx. By means of an ingeniously contrived apparatus, which was applied to some of those present, the action of the most important muscles employed in breathing and singing were registered on revolving cylinders, the results of the majority of the experiments supporting the lecturer's theory that the best results in singing were to be obtained by the diaphragm being depressed during inhalation and raised during expiration. This theory, however, was contested by some who were present, and it would appear that a contrary action could be cultivated.

STREATHAM CHORAL SOCIETY.

The second Concert of this enterprising Society's eighth season, on April 30, was unusually attractive on account of the inclusion in the programme of Dvorák's Mass in D. This beautiful work, one of the least exacting, but by no means least interesting or effective, of the Bohemian master's choral compositions, is so admirably suited for performance by choral societies which are unable to attack full-blown modern oratorios, and yet are anxious to provide something above the level of works written "specially for country choirs," that it should meet a distinct want in the happiest manner. The devotional and melodious Kyrie, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei; the impetuous, jubilant Gloria; and the wonderfully dramatic, unconventional, and impressive Credo, with its acutely expressive harmonies at the agonized outburst, "Crucifixus," are all movements which have the power of stirring any audience and drawing forth from any chorus its best efforts. This was the case at the performance under notice, for the choir sang with great care and alternate refinement and vigour, its sonority in the ff passages, especially in the Credo, being as remarkable as it was thrilling. A complete professional band gave a good account of the picturesque and ingenious orchestration, and a competent vocal quartet, consisting of Misses Evelyn Langdon and Edith Hands, Messrs. Braxton Smith and Arthur Oswald, did justice to the solos.

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL AT BONN.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

A calm sea and prosperous voyage seemed quite àpropos in travelling from London to a Beethoven Festival at Bonn; also pleasant, though the fine steamers now running between Harwich and Holland make one almost indifferent to the particular mood of the clerk of the weather. During three days (4th to 6th ult.) high festival was held at Bonn in honour of the great composer born there. At first blush it might seem unnecessary to set apart days for the performance of Beethoven's music, for his works are constantly being played all over the world; and this is especially true of the Symphonies which alone figured in the Bonn programmes; but it must be remembered that they were heard here under special circumstances. Wagner objected to one of his operas being sandwiched between "Marta" and "Le Prophète," and sometimes the effect of a Beethoven Symphony in a concert-room is disturbed by what comes before or after, or by both. At the great Beethoven Commemoration Concerts of 1870-71, held at the Crystal Palace, all the nine Symphonies were certainly played in chronological order and with only Beethoven music in the programmes, but at Bonn they were given in immediate succession, three each day, on three consecutive days, and they formed the entire Festival programme. It was quite a unique opportunity of following the master's progress from the days of his musical apprenticeship down to the period of his highest achievements. And not only that, but each programme presented some very striking contrasts. In the first, the great gulf between the first and second Symphonies and the "Eroica" was rendered forcibly visible; in the second, the peaceful "Pastoral" came just after the C minor with its volcanic bursts and, at the close, its exuberant joy; while in the third, the seventh and eighth Symphonies displayed the triumph, as it were, of instrumental music; but the ninth showed the strivings of genius successfully to pour new wine into old bottles.

The plan of the Festival was, then, in the highest degree praiseworthy, but it was also fully realised. In the first place the Conductor was Professor Dr. Franz Wüllner, a man specially qualified for the post. As a young man he learnt Beethoven's music from Schindler, whose peculiarities—as Dr. Wüllner himself remarked—interfered with the recognition due to his great merit; afterwards, in many ways active, he gained that experience which strengthens natural gifts; while at the present moment he is at the head of an orchestra which fully enjoys the great reputation which it has won. The Symphonies were interpreted by the famous "Gürzenich" Orchestra, from Cologne. Dr. Wüllner did not take advantage of the fact that to him and his men the music was quite familiar, and that they understood one another. Meetings were held each morning and all the works carefully rehearsed. Dr. Wüllner throws all possible earnestness and energy into his work; and, as with all great conductors, he has the power of communicating thought and feeling with wonderful clearness and rapidity. All the Symphonies were well played, but it seemed, at times, as if the players were moved by the Conductor to special effort; the second was, perhaps, the red-letter day of the Festival. The united choirs of Bonn and Cologne took part in the "Choral," and sang with power and decision. The solo vocalists were Frau Röhr-Brajnin, Fräulein Huhn, Herren Kalisch and Sistermans, who all sang artistically; the first-named being heard to advantage in the difficult soprano music. There were some exceedingly pleasant gatherings of artists, visitors, and members of the Festival Committee each day, after the rehearsal in the morning and Concert in the evening. On Sunday evening Dr. Wüllner was, of course, received with enthusiasm, and the remark made in a brief speech by M. Vincent d'Indy, the well-known French composer, that "there is one Beethoven, and Wüllner is his prophet," was applauded to the echo. The Bonn Festival will long be held in pleasant remembrance by all who were present.

REVIEWS.

The Art of Music. By C. Hubert H. Parry. [Kegan Paul, Trench and Co.]

The title of this book by no means does justice to its contents. "The Evolution of Music" would have been more accurate; for the work presents, in fact, to quote a sentence of the author's, "a continuous and unbroken record of human effort to extend and enhance the possibilities of effects of sound upon human sensibilities, as representing in a formal or a direct manner the expression of man's inner being." Such a record is clearly neither more nor less than a "philosophy of history"—that is to say, a picture in which the successive events of history are presented as inevitable results of the operation of a few simple causes. History has been superbly defined as "philosophy teaching by examples." How few histories, of any subject, come up to this ideal! Strings of facts, dates, names of persons and places—do not these still make up the whole idea of "history" as conceived by many minds and exhibited in many books? Dr. Parry and one or two other writers have done their best to dispel this delusion, and they deserve the warmest thanks of all who know what "education" really means; but in "The Art of Music" we have quite the ideal book of its kind, as, indeed, everyone who knows the author's primer, "A Summary of Mediæval and Modern Musical History," will be ready to believe. In that masterly little volume the author completed his task in something over a hundred pages. In the larger work now under notice he has allowed himself about three times that number, and has taken us into the "dark backward and abysm of time," before even a scale had been arrived at. This part of the book is particularly valuable, the views put forward being in many cases quite new. We have first a chapter on the impulses to which the origin of music is due. There are no fanciful assumptions, no guesses—everything is strictly scientific and easily verifiable. A remarkable chapter on Folk-music, and another in which the scale systems of the world are classified, follow, and these may be safely quoted as superior to anything hitherto written on the subjects of which they treat. Each, indeed, might very well be expanded into a volume. Other admirable chapters are those on "The Rise of Secular Music" and on "Modern Tendencies." But the book altogether is so excellent that it is not too much to characterise it as "epoch making" There is little likelihood of another work on the subject being wanted for years and years to come.

Les Lurs de l'âge de Bronze, au Musée National de Copenhague. Par le Dr. Angul Hammerich. The French translation by E. Beauvois. [Copenhagen: Thiele, 1894.]

There is a great interest attached to the fine collection of bronze horns (Lur, old Norse; ludr, great horn) in the National Museum at Copenhagen. These primitive instruments are of singular aspect, as is shown by the faithful woodcuts in Dr. Hammerich's pamphlet. They are serpentine tubes from about five to eight feet in length, approximating in these measurements to the modern trumpet, the alto and tenor trombones. The bore is conical throughout, and of very slender diameter near the mouthpiece, it is only a little wider at the other end. A chemical analysis of the metal gives: copper, 88·90; tin, 10·61; and iron, 0·49, which is the ordinary composition of metal used in the Bronze age. The tube is composed of several pieces, the joining of which is skilfully and efficiently guaranteed. The mouthpiece is of cup form, a little narrower than that of a trombone, but, unlike our modern brass instruments, it is a fixture. The tubes are terminated by ornamented circular plates, and carry near the mouthpieces embellishments of carved ornaments and tassels, and chains for support. It is an extraordinary fact that the peat-mosses of Denmark have preserved, instead of destroying by corrosion, these old-world metal instruments. Dr. Hammerich attributes to them an age of 2,500 years. They belong to these northern countries only; a few small specimens have been found in Mecklenburg, eight in a fragmentary state in Sweden. The largest number has been recovered in Denmark, where twenty-three have been found—fourteen in perfect condition, and all, as already said, in peat-mosses. Nineteen of these are in the National Museum at Copenhagen. The lurs are usually found in pairs and appear to have been thus used together, which implies considerable skill to ensure their being of the same pitch. There are pairs in C, D, E flat, E, and G. The E flat lurs are at French pitch, the others a little higher. Of course, the usual harmonics of metal tubes with small bores are attainable. The question naturally arises were these horns, when used in pairs, employed to sound divergent notes? Dr. Hammerich refers to the hypothesis of Fétis, that we are indebted to the Scandinavians for the origin of our modern harmony. We owe Dr. Hammerich our thanks for this valuable essay.

Orchestral Ballad in A minor. By Stewart Macpherson. Arranged for pianoforte solo. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

An orchestral work transcribed for the pianoforte must, of course, suffer to some extent; but Mr. Macpherson has arranged his clever and pleasing Ballad most successfully. One can feel that it is music written for many instruments, but the hand of a skilful pianist can be traced throughout; despite the polyphony, there are no uncomfortable passages to play. Still the transcription demands a good and intelligent pianist to render it justice. The opening phrase, showing Scotch influence, is ingeniously developed—to that indeed it readily lends itself—and without sense of effort. The Scherzando section in F is exceedingly light and graceful, and the "Meistersinger" colouring rather pleasant than otherwise. The Ballad is dedicated to Dr. A. C. Mackenzie.

Studien bei Hans von Bülow. Von Theodor Pfeiffer. [Berlin: Fr. Leuckhardt.]

"Bülow is a schoolmaster, but an eminent one," so spake Liszt on one occasion. And Liszt acknowledged that he himself had learnt much from Bülow's edition of some of the Beethoven Sonatas. Yes, great pianist as he was, Bülow was, perhaps, still greater as a commentator, both by writing and by word of mouth, and as a practical teacher. No musician ever studied more thoroughly and more earnestly the masters of all periods than he. During the summer of the years 1884, 1885, and 1886 Bülow gave a course of lectures on pianoforte playing at the Raff Conservatorium, at Frankfort-on-the-Main; he used to play and expound, and sometimes pianists would play to him, and hear some words of wisdom from his lips. Many of his sayings were treasured up, and in this interesting volume we have his comments on various works by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Chopin, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Mozart, and Raff—the names are here given in alphabetical order, not order of merit. It need scarcely be said that such a book is of striking interest, and, more than that, of immense practical value. Even if one should venture to differ at times from the learned doctor, one cannot but feel thankful to him for his remarks concerning both the letter and the spirit of the music of these masters. Many an extract could be given, but just one or two must here suffice. All pianists ought to read and study the volume for themselves. There is no such thing as an easy piece; everything is difficult; this is a fact which all young, and some grown-up pianists are in danger of forgetting. And here is a true saying: In Bach and Beethoven every note is gold; study them, therefore, with painful precision; for each note plays its important part. But, besides such general sayings, there are many valuable hints with regard to fingering, phrasing, and interpretation generally. The volume contains a life-like portrait of the eminent pianist.

In der Natur ("Vpřirodě"), Carneval, Otello. Three Overtures (Op. 91). By A. Dvorák. Arranged as pianoforte duet by the composer.

Dumky. Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Op. 90). By A. Dvorák. Arranged as pianoforte duet by the composer. [Berlin: N. Simrock.]

THE Bohemian composer, in spite of his official duties in America, has not allowed his pen to become idle; of this the above list of works gives sufficient evidence. The three Overtures are classed together under one opus number, but this is not their only connection. One theme appears in all three, and such fact, combined with the title which each bears, suggests that a programme underlies the music, one which, probably, the composer was wise in withholding. This expressive theme is heard at the opening of No. 1, in the quiet middle section of the "Carneval," while in No. 3 it occupies a very prominent position. No. 1 is peaceful and full of charm. Beethoven's "Pastoral" and the "Siegfried" bird-music seem to have haunted the composer, but, setting aside one trifling reminiscence, he has assimilated, not copied. No. 2 is, as its title suggests, full of fun and frolic; there is a touch of Berlioz about the music. Both numbers contain some exceedingly clever workmanship. No. 3 touches a higher level. It is very dramatic, and there is every reason to believe the statement that it was suggested by the last scene of Shakespeare's tragedy.

The Trio is a fantastic composition. In the Dumka, or "Elegy" (we presume "Dumky" is another spelling of the same word), of his E flat Quartet, Dvorák has twice a slow followed by a quick section. The Trio follows a similar course, only on a more extended scale. This work is thoroughly Bohemian from first note to last, and, moreover, one of the composer's most characteristic productions. The music is full of life, vigour, feeling, and fancy; the constant changes from grave to gay keep the attention ever on the alert. The work, though not written on ordinary classical lines, is no wild fantasia, but music in which nature, controlled by art, has full play.

The pianoforte cannot, of course, give the colouring, but the arrangements in duet form are effective and will be most welcome—besides, those who prefer to have the works in their original form can do so.

A short Historical Account of the Degrees in Music at Oxford and Cambridge. By C. F. Abdy Williams. [Novello, Ewer & Co.]

THE attention given of late years by our Universities to the cultivation of music, and the endeavour to make the degrees of Doctor and Bachelor in that faculty of substantial value, induced Mr. Abdy Williams to investigate the early history of these degrees. Our author is of opinion that they were originally bestowed as "marks of honour and esteem," without any examination or exercise; but that when "less eminent musicians began to supplicate for these degrees, the Universities required some testimony as to the fitness of the applicant," and he brings forward strong facts in support of his contention. The titles of some of the chapters—III. Early musical study at the Universities; V. The establishment of professors of music at the Universities; VII. The cultivation of music at the Universities—will show how extremely interesting are the contents of this volume. Two chapters will prove a special boon to students and writers—viz., those which contain a list of the Oxford and Cambridge Graduates of Music respectively, with biographical sketches. The earliest name is that of Henry Habyngton, or Abyngdon, who took the degree of Mus. Bac. at Cambridge in 1463; the lists of both Universities are brought right down to 1893. In an appendix the names are given of persons mentioned in history as graduates, but of whom there is no record in the University registers.

Suite for Violin and Pianoforte ("Hamlet"). By Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer & Co.]

THE old Suite form consisted of a series of movements based on various dance rhythms, and concluded with a lively jigg. The modern spirit is, however, reflected in Mr. Berthold Tours's Suite, in which the character of the music is determined by the poetical basis; there are no lively strains at the close, but a Funeral March for the "Burial of Ophelia." An Andante expressivo has "The Ghost" as superscription. The "Polonius" movement is lively and graceful, and grateful to both players. "The King's March" is dignified, and the repeated use of the sharp 3rd inversion of the Italian sixth seems to tell of the monarch's uneasy conscience. A short Intermezzo is entitled "The King's Prayer." Hamlet and Ophelia have each a tone-picture, and both are appropriately quiet and mournful. The "Funeral March" is the last, but by no means the least interesting number of the series. Mr. Tours's name is sufficient guarantee that the music is sound and that the comfort of the performers is duly studied.

Selection of Themes from the Music to "The Tempter." Arranged for the pianoforte by the composer, Edward German.

Suite from the Music to "The Tempter." Arranged as Pianoforte Duet by the composer, Edward German. [Edwin Ashdown.]

THE musically disposed who witnessed Mr. Henry A. Jones's play produced by Mr. Tree at the Haymarket Theatre on September 20 last, will doubtless welcome this issue of Mr. German's clever music which so greatly enhanced the impressiveness of the play. From the nature of the music, the "selection" is necessarily somewhat fragmentary in character, but the "supper music" makes a graceful little piece in the form of a minuet. The Suite comprises the stormy Overture, the graceful berceuse, and the wild bacchanalian dance, the whole forming an effective duet of moderate executive difficulty.

Glances across the Sea. By J. Müller (Op. 10). [Novello, Ewer & Co.]

THIS is a set of short pianoforte pieces after the manner of Schumann's "Album," and the influence of the German composer is also felt in Mr. Müller's music. He differs, however, from his predecessor in not giving titles to each movement, excepting to the last, which has the superscription "Lebewohl, auf Wiedersehn" ("Farewell, au revoir"). There are, in all, only eight numbers, and all are short, a great recommendation in these days in which time is so precious. The music throughout is interesting, but the numbers most deserving of mention are No. 3, with its persistent, but not monotonous theme; the crisp, characteristic No. 6; and the quiet, expressive No. 8. The music, merely from a technical point of view, is effective.

Selected Letters of Mendelssohn. Edited by W. F. Alexander, M.A. [Swan, Sonnenschein and Co.]

THERE is a tendency in certain quarters to depreciate Mendelssohn as a composer, but there is one point in which men of all shades of opinion cordially agree, and it is this, that the composer of "Elijah" was an admirable letter-writer. But he was also a voluminous one, and Mr. Alexander has had the good idea of making a selection—and an excellent one. This little book contains thirty-three letters, among which are many to members of his family. There is also a useful "Chronological Table of Events" connected with the life of the composer. And there are two other attractive features—an excellent portrait of Mendelssohn, and a preface from Sir G. Grove, one of the most genuine and enthusiastic admirers of the master.

A MEETING of the Incorporated Society of Musicians was held, on April 26, in the hall of the Royal Society of Musicians, Sir John Stainer presiding. The Chairman said the present system of allowing anyone to teach music was producing disastrous effects throughout the country, and though there were difficulties in the way of bringing about any good registration measure, he thought that the next generation would be benefited by such a scheme. The first resolution he proposed was that the legislature should be asked to grant powers to an authorised council to compile, maintain, and issue an official list of qualified teachers.—Dr. C. W. Pearce seconded the motion, which was carried.—Mr. W. H. Cummings proposed, and Mr. W. G. McNaught seconded, a resolution for the formation of a committee to prepare a plan of registration.—Dr. J. F. Bridge proposed and Dr. Sawyer seconded the third resolution, which gave a list of the representatives from the various institutions to be members of the committee.

FOREIGN NOTES.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—The seventy-first Lower Rhenish Musical Festival, held at Whitsun, was a great success. M. Edgar Tinel's Oratorio "Franciscus" was performed for the first time at these gatherings, and enthusiastically received. M. Paderewski was, however, the hero of the Festival, and after his performance of his Polish Fantasia he received a tremendous ovation. The Conductors were Herren Schwickerath, of this town, and Schuch, of Dresden.

ANTWERP.—The musical arrangements at the opening of the Exhibition included the performance of a cantata, "The Genius of the Fatherland," by M. Peter Benoit. Seventeen hundred instrumentalists and singers took part in it. The work is not new, as it was composed for the Brussels Exhibition of 1880. Since then the composer has reduced his big score by one "instrument"—viz., the cannon, which would insist on missing its cue, and boom at the wrong moment.

BAYREUTH.—The following artists have been cast for the forthcoming Festival performances:—Elsa, Madame Nordica; Ortrud, Miss Marie Brema and Fräulein Mailhac; Lohengrin, E. van Dyck; King Henry, Karl Grengg and Max Mosel; Telramund, D. Popovici; Tannhäuser, W. Grüning; Wolfram, Th. Reichmann and G. Kaschmann; Landgraf, Georg Döring; Walther von der Vogelweide, Emil Gerhäuser; Elizabeth, Fräulein Elisa Wiborg and Johanna Gadski; Venus, Fräulein Mailhac; Parsifal, E. van Dyck, W. Grüning, and Willy Birrenkoren; Kundry, Frau Rosa Sucher and Miss Marie Brema; Gurnemanz, Karl Grengg and Max Mosel; Amfortas, G. Kaschmann and Th. Reichmann; Klingsor, F. Planck and Michael Takats; Titurel, W. Fenten.—Some weeks ago an exquisitely wrought silver laurel wreath arrived here from Paris and was deposited in the Liszt Mausoleum. It bears the inscription in French and Russian, "To the memory of Franz Liszt, from the new Russian School of Music."

BERLIN.—Apropos of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the death of the famous "Balladen componist," Carl Loewe, a Concert, wholly devoted to his compositions, was given on April 19 in the Philharmonie. The programme included the overture and a chorus from an opera, "Rudolf"; a chorus for female voices from another opera, "Malekadhel"; several symphonic movements for orchestra, the last part of the Oratorio "The Raising of Lazarus," and, of course, a number of ballads, which proved by far the most interesting portion of the programme.

BREMEN.—Eugen d'Albert's fairy opera, "Der Rubin," was given here, for the first time, at the Town Theatre, on April 19, under the direction of the composer. The work was splendidly mounted and had been carefully rehearsed. Its success was very considerable.—Anton Rubinstein must have a number of very enthusiastic admirers in this town, which is to have a Rubinstein Festspielhaus specially built for the performance of the "Paradise Lost," "Tower of Babel," "Moses," and "Christus." A committee, with Herr Heinrich Bulthaupt, the author of the libretto of "Christus," at its head, has already been formed to take the preliminary steps; and some years hence, mayhap, all musical Europe will flock to the old Hansa town to experience a new sensation. Ah! perhaps!

BRESCIA.—To celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the foundation of the Concert Society, a grand Concert wholly devoted to compositions by Signor Antonio Bazzini, the director of the Milan Conservatoire, was given on April 28. Bazzini is a native of Brescia.

BRESLAU.—Humperdinck's fairy opera, "Hänsel und Gretel," which promises to make the round of the German theatres, was given here for the first time on April 18, and was as successful as in the many other towns in which it has already been performed.

BRUSSELS.—M. van Dyck appeared three times at the Théâtre de la Monnaie towards the close of the opera season. His success as Werther in Massenet's opera and "Lohengrin" was exceptionally brilliant. Of the novelties produced during the season, Wagner's "Tristan" was given thirteen times and Bruneau's "L'Attaque du Moulin" twenty-four times, which latter number was only reached by Gounod's "Faust." Bruneau's work seems to share the fate of other operas by French composers which are now considered masterpieces. The Parisians "will have none of it," but foreigners give it a hearty reception.

CARLSRUHE.—Massenet's sacred drama, "Marie Magdeleine," was performed for the first time in Germany, by the Philharmonic Society, on April 18.

COLOGNE.—"A Basso Porto" is the title of a new opera by a new composer, Signor Niccola Spinelli, which was produced at the Town Theatre on April 18, and met with great success. The composer is still a young man, having been born in 1865 at Turin. The plot of his opera is a continuation of Tasca's "A Santa Lucia," and deals with treachery, jealousy, vengeance, and murder in the recognised style of the "Young Italy" verismo, only more so.

CREMONA.—On April 21 a new opera in one act, "Maledetta," by Guiseppi Ferri, lately a student at the Milan Conservatoire, was produced at the Ricci Theatre. The plot is of the most gruesome description, but the music is highly spoken of.

DRESDEN.—On the 19th ult. the 500th performance of Weber's "Freischütz" took place at the Court Theatre.—At the recent Anglican Church Conference, held at Dresden on the 16th and 17th ult., interesting papers on Church Music on the Continent were read by Mr. B. S. Ward, for more than twenty-three years Organist and Choirmaster of All Saints', Dresden; and by Mr. J. Lomas, Organist and Choirmaster of St. George's, Paris. In both papers stress was laid on the duty of the English abroad to uphold the dignity of church music; and Mr. Ward, in dwelling at some length on the subject of chanting, welcomed the publication of Dr. Troutbeck's Cathedral Paragraph Psalter as a valuable aid to the worthier rendering of the Psalms. At the close of the Conference an Organ Recital was given by Mr. Ward in All Saints', on the organ built by Messrs. J. W. Walker and Sons.

DUISBURG.—The third subscription Concert, on April 22, was devoted to Beethoven. The programme contained only two numbers, but as they were the Mass in C and the Choral Symphony there was no lack of quantity or quality.

GENOA.—The heirs of the late violinist, Camillo Sivori, have presented to the municipality of this town the various orders and medals with which the deceased virtuoso had been decorated, as well as the violin which Paganini had given to him. This instrument will be exhibited in the town museum by the side of Paganini's.

HAMBURG.—A committee has been formed here to erect a monument to the late Hans von Bülow. Amongst its members are such well known names as Johannes Brahms, Joseph Joachim, F. Spielhagen, Felix von Weingartner, Eugen d'Albert, Fr. Chrysander, Theodor Kirchner, Gustav Mahler, Felix Mottl, Paul Heyse, and Richard Strauss.

HANAU.—On April 17 the Oratorio Society here produced a new choral work by Ed. Stehle, Domcapellmeister in St. Gallen. It is entitled "Frithjof's Heimkehr," and is a continuation of Max Bruch's "Frithjof." It was well performed and most favourably received.

KIEL.—In connection with the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the local choral society, a Musical Festival will take place here on the 17th and 18th inst., the programme of which will include Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Brahms's "Schicksalslied," the third part of Schumann's "Faust," Beethoven's Choral Symphony, the Quintet from Wagner's "Meistersinger," &c. The chorus will number 450 and the orchestra eighty-two performers. Professor Stange will conduct.

LEIPZIG.—Miss Edith Robinson, who was for a number of years a pupil of Brodsky's at the Conservatoire, and is highly esteemed in Germany as a violinist, gave a farewell Concert on April 19, at the old Gewandhaus, previous to her return to England. The programme included three double Concertos—viz., Bach's in D minor for two violins, Mozart's in E flat for violin and viola, and Brahms's in A minor for violin and violoncello. Her associates in these works were Messrs. Prill, Hans Sitt, and Julius Klengel. The numerous audience rewarded the talented English violinist with enthusiastic applause.—Verdi's "Falstaff," in the German version by Max Kalbeck, was performed at the new Town Theatre, for the first time, on April 30, and met with a brilliant reception.—Anton Rubinstein gave, on April 22, a Recital in the great hall of the new Gewandhaus for the benefit of music students, who were admitted free. The programme consisted, as it did on similar occasions at Berlin and Dresden, only of pieces of his own composition. Needless to say the crowded audience waxed extremely enthusiastic and asked for "more." The good-natured master, however, had the good sense to say "nay" to such an unreasonable request. ——On the following day Miss Thekla Friedländer (who is well remembered in London), an intimate friend of the great pianist, gave a Concert in his honour, when the programme was again made up of works from his pen. It included the songs and "Requiem for Mignon" from Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister," the Violoncello Concerto in A minor, and several choruses from the Oratorio "The Tower of Babel." To show his appreciation of the enthusiastic ovation of which he had been the recipient during the evening, Rubinstein sat down at the pianoforte after the Concert and played several pieces of his own composition.

Milan.—Signor Gastaldon's new opera "Pater" was but moderately successful on its production at the Manzoni Theatre on April 16. The plot is founded by V. Bianchi on Coppée's novel.

Mondovi.—Signor Alexandre Sanfelici, a pupil of the late Signor Ponchielli, has written an opera in two acts, entitled "Nenella," which was produced some time since at the Breo Theatre. Although the story is an imitation of the "Cavalleria," the new work was very coldly received. The composer, says a local critic, is young, but his music is old and full of imitations and reminiscences.

Moscow.—Leoncavallo's "I Medici" was performed here for the first time by the Italian Opera Company on April 15. A "great success" is announced.

Paris.—The 100th performance of "Lohengrin," at the Grand Opéra, took place on the 7th ult., with M. van Dyck in the title rôle. It was really the 101st performance. The 100th was given some ten days previously, but as the original Paris Lohengrin was not in the French capital at the time, it was naïvely numbered 99*bis*. The success of the great tenor was such that he is almost sure to be invited to sing the part of Tristan when Wagner's masterpiece is performed in the autumn.——On the 13th ult. the 1,000th performance of Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon" at the Opéra Comique was given. Admission to the theatre was free, so that Parisians of all classes could take part in so unique an artistic event. A further celebration took place on the 15th, when a "Gala" performance of selections from the most important works of the doyen of French musicians was given to a brilliant and specially invited audience.——"Le Portrait de Manon," libretto by George Boyer, music by Massenet, was successfully produced at the Opéra Comique on the 8th ult.——The last of the Châtelet Concerts was conducted by Edvard Grieg, and the programme consisted exclusively of his compositions. The orchestra played the Suite "Aus Holberg's Zeit," M. Pugno performed the Pianoforte Concerto, and Mdlle. Esther Sidner sang a number of songs, accompanied by the composer. The "Chopin of the North," as Bülow once called Grieg, was enthusiastically applauded. —— M. Alexandre de Winogradsky, the director of the Kieff Imperial Musical Society, conducted at the Salle d'Harcourt a Concert devoted exclusively to Russian music. The most important number in the long programme was Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. Amongst the other composers represented were Rubinstein, Dargomijsky, Ivanoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glinka, Mousorgsky, César Cui, Borodine, &c. M. Winogradsky proved himself to be a Conductor of rare qualities, and he was rewarded with an ovation at the conclusion of the Concert.——The paper l'Evénement is responsible for the statement that Berlioz's opera "La Prise de Troie" will shortly be produced at the Eden Theatre, with Herr Felix Mottl as Conductor.

Rome.—Massenet's "Manon," which was recently performed for the first time here, at the Constanzi Theatre, met with great success.

Sion (Switzerland).—A new four-act opera, "Blanche de Mans," composed by M. Ch. Hœnni, the director of the local school of music, was lately produced here.

Stockholm.—Beethoven's opus summum, the "Missa Solemnis," was performed here for the first time (!) on April 24, and with such great success that it had to be repeated on April 26. Both performances drew crowded audiences.

Stuttgart.—On the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th inst. a Musical Festival on a large scale will take place here in the Gewerbehalle. On the first day Rubinstein will conduct his new sacred opera—in seven "occurrences" and a prologue—"Christus," while Beethoven's seventh and Mozart's E flat Symphonies, the Finale from Mendelssohn's "Loreley," the Overtures "Iphigenia in Aulis" and "Leonore" (No. 3), the Prelude and Graalsfeier from "Parsifal," and other works will form the other programmes. Amongst the soloists are Frau Klafsky, Fräulein Wiborg, Herr von zur Mühlen, the violinist, César Thomson, &c. The orchestra will consist of 150 players, and the choir will number 600.

Warsaw.—An interesting historical Concert was given recently by the local musical society. The first part of the programme, which had been arranged by M. Alexandre Polinski, the secretary of the society, was divided into four sections: (1) Ancient music, represented by a Hebrew melody and an ode by Pindar; (2) Christian hymnology, the Ambrosian hymn, "Veni Creator Spiritus"; (3) Music of the Troubadours, four specimens of which were sung; (4) Sacred music, represented by Motets, &c., by Josquin des Près, Palestrina, and Allegri. The second part of the Concert included works by Bach, Handel, Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Chopin, and Wagner.

Weimar.—Richard Strauss's anxiously awaited opera, "Guntram," was successfully produced here on the 10th ult. No further details are as yet to hand——This year's meeting of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein will be held here between the 1st and 6th inst., and not at Nürnberg as originally arranged. The "programme" includes Richard Strauss's new opera "Guntram" and Verdi's "Falstaff" at the Court Theatre, Liszt's Oratorio "Christus" in the town church, and three Concerts. On the 31st ult. E. Humperdinck's fairy opera "Hänsel und Gretel" was to be performed in the Court Theatre for the benefit of those visitors who had arrived before the official opening of the meeting.

Wiesbaden.—Herr Louis Lüstner, the energetic Conductor of the "Städtische Cur-Orchester," seems to be ahead of the majority of his German colleagues in his appreciation of English music, to judge from the frequency with which English composers are included in his programmes. Thus, at the 221st and 222nd of the "Abonnementsconcerte," Sir Arthur Sullivan was represented by his Overture "Di Ballo" and Mr. Edward German by his "Three Dances" from "Henry VIII." Herr Lüstner's programmes are generally very cosmopolitan in character, and evince a sound as well as catholic taste.

Zurich.—During the month of May a Wagner Cycle, comprising "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan," and "The Meistersingers," was given here.

Mr. August Manns has now completed the musical arrangements for the Handel Festival, which takes place at the Crystal Palace at the end of this month. The intermediate day (Wednesday, the 27th inst.) will, as usual, be devoted to a selection from other sacred and secular works by the great composer. Choruses from "Deborah," "Jephtha," "Joshua," "Solomon," "Acis and Galatea," and the "Ode on Cecilia's Day" will be included in the programme; also such favourite airs as "From mighty Kings," "Ombra mai fù," "Let the bright Seraphim," "O had I Jubal's Lyre," "Sound an alarm," "Love in her eyes," "Waft her, Angels," "Love sounds th' alarm," "Honour and Arms," and "Nasce al bosco." The grand full rehearsal will take place on Friday, the 22nd inst. The programme will include, in addition to airs and duets, the principal choruses in "The Messiah" and "Israel in Egypt," and also those in the Selection day programme. Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock has been appointed Organist to the Festival in the place of Mr. Eyre, who has resigned through ill-health.

On the 21st ult. a presentation was made to Mr. W. Haynes, who had been for forty-three years Organist of the Malvern Priory Church. Mr. Atkins, on behalf of the committee, presented to Mr. Haynes a large silver salver and a purse containing £170, as a lasting memorial of the high regard the people of Malvern and elsewhere had for him.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE musical season in Bristol, which has been brought to a close with the events to be hereafter recorded, has been in some respects disappointing, while in other respects reason for encouragement has been given. Owing to the inability to secure a convenient hall, but more especially to the lack of adequate support, the splendid Orchestral Concerts, which have been revived several times, have practically been allowed to lapse again. The recent Triennial Festival which has never been surpassed in artistic excellence, resulted in a loss. Another old-established musical society is not in so flourishing a state financially as it should be. The Saturday Popular Concerts need more pecuniary aid. An accumulation of debt, which the public in their apathy would not join in liquidating, has led to the abandonment of the Bristol and Clifton Public Band. These things are deeply to be deplored, as the declining support given to music of high class, which nearly all these institutions represent, disheartens those who have the responsibility of their management. On the other hand, there has been a continued increase in the number of smaller musical bodies, especially choral societies, so that it may be said that choral and instrumental music is being studied in almost every parish of the city. Glad as everyone must be to know that music is being brought closer to individual homes, it is to be hoped that the older and larger societies may not suffer in consequence.

The ninth season of Popular Chamber Concerts was brought to a close on the 10th ult., when Dvorák's Quintet for pianoforte and strings (Op. 81) and Beethoven's String Quartet (Op. 18, No. 4) were the concerted pieces embraced in the programme. The executants were Miss Mary Lock, Messrs. Theo. Carrington, Harold Bernard, F. S. Gardner, and E. Pavey; Miss Jennie Roberts was the vocalist, and Mr. Fulford the accompanist.

Knowle Musical Society, a body newly formed, with Mr. W. J. Kidner as Conductor, gave its first Concert, on the 26th ult., with highly satisfactory results. The scheme was made up chiefly of selections from oratorios, part-songs, songs, and instrumental pieces. The choir sang Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and "How lovely are the messengers" ("St. Paul"), "The heavens are telling" ("Creation"), Sullivan's hymn "Homeland," Dr. Vincent's clever choral fantasia on national melodies, and the part-songs and glees: "Slumber Song" (Allen), "The Pilgrims" (Leslie), "In this hour of softened splendour" (Pinsuti), "In the lovely vale of streams" (Callcott), and "Summer eve" (Hatton). The solo vocalists were Miss Cromey, Mr. W. Thomas, and Mr. M. Durnford. Miss Louie Shipway's pianoforte piece was Weber's "L'Invitation à la Valse." The results of the first venture of the Society are such as to augur well for its continuance and for the attainment of greater efficiency as time goes on.

A pleasing Concert was given on the 8th ult. by the Bishopston Church Choral Society. The principal work brought forward was Lahee's "The Building of the Ship," the solos being taken by Miss Jessie Sweet, Miss Amy Brodribb, Mrs. George Bennett, Mr. A. M. Warren, and Mr. W. Purnell. The second portion of the programme contained the part-songs "The Belfry Tower" (Hatton) and "The Song of the Vikings" (Faning), which were also creditably sung. Mr. W. E. B. Westcott conducted.

Mrs. Clara Novello Davies's Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir gave a performance in Bristol on April 25.

On the 9th ult. Stapleton Choral Society sang Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and Spohr's "God, Thou art great," in the Parish Church. Miss Marie Gane, Miss Clara Aldersley, and Mr. H. Burn were the soloists; Mr. P. R. Barclay presided at the organ, and Mr. J. Burn conducted. The members of the choir acquitted themselves in a manner that reflected upon them the highest credit, while such capable artists as the principals named naturally rendered the solos with taste and expression.

Keynsham Choral Society, a young progressing body, gave a performance of Bennett's "May Queen" on the 9th ult. The soloists were Miss Cromey, Miss Ada Cox, Mr. Fancourt, and Mr. W. Thomas. Under the direction of Mr. J. H. Fulford the tuneful cantata was well interpreted and gave great pleasure to the assemblage. The singing of Hatton's glee "Ah, could I with fancy stray," also afforded the choir an opportunity of showing its efficiency. The second part of the programme contained songs given by Miss Cromey, Miss Cox, and Mr. Thomas; a violin solo and a pianoforte solo, played by Miss Maud Riseley and Miss Rose Thomas respectively, and movements from a Quartet of Rheinberger for strings and pianoforte, in which Misses Maud, Juliet, and Mabel Riseley and Mr. J. H. Fulford were associated.

After the lapse of several years, a second Festival of Church Choirs was held on the 10th ult., in Thornbury Church. Fifteen choirs took part in the event as follows: Thornbury, Olveston, Oldbury, Compton, Winterbourne, Winterbourne Down, Iron Acton, Rockhampton, Stone, Hill, Almondsbury, Tytherington, Frenchay, Dursley, and Folfield, the voices numbering 314. Mr. Chambers presided at the organ, and the Rev. C. R. Ward conducted. Tallis's Setting of the Preces and Responses was used; the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were Langdon Colborne's in A; and the anthem was Sir G. Elvey's "O give thanks unto the Lord." Considering that all the singers were drawn from purely country districts, where the best of material is not generally available, the results were praiseworthy to a degree and showed what can be done by judiciously directed efforts. It is to be hoped the Festival may be made an annual one.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Tercentenary of Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina was appropriately celebrated with much éclat and grandeur in the Ecclesiastical College of Maynooth on the 17th ult., when a large number of distinguished visitors, including the Bishop of Canea, the Duchess of Leinster, Viscount and Lady Glentworth, &c., attended the celebration and enjoyed the proverbial hospitality of the sacerdotal Alma Mater by invitation of the president, Monsignor Browne. Palestrina's six-part Mass, "Ecce ego Johannes," was solemnly sung by the College Choir, assisted by the boys of the Christian Schools, Richmond Street, Dublin, who won the first prize at last year's municipal competitions. Palestrina's Offertory "Confirma hoc" and Motet "Homo quidam," both in five parts, also formed part of the sacred function, and the "Credo" and remainder of the "Proper" were Gregorian. The excellence of the performance was worthy of a Continental Cathedral, and reflects great credit on the Maynooth Professor of Sacred Music, Rev. H. Bewerunge, who directed the Palestrina music and accompanied the Gregorian with a skill which is the result of profound study of these little known springs of the musical art. The Professor also showed his skill as an executant by a performance of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat. After the High Mass, Professor Bewerunge lectured in the Aula maxima on Palestrina and Orlando di Lasso, and, in further illustration of Palestrina's music, the choir performed the First Lamentation and the Motet "O Pastor Bone" of the "Princeps Musicæ."

On the 8th ult. St. George's Choral Union performed Bennett's "May Queen" at St. George's Parochial Hall, under the direction of Mr. Raymond Revelle.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

BUT for the Spring visit of the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company an almost complete musical stagnation would have been all we could chronicle this month.

Only two Concerts were given, a Chamber Concert by Mr. Grant McNeill, in the Freemason's Hall (18th ult.), and by Madame Sophie Menter, in the Music Hall (19th ult.). Both audiences were the poorer for the counter attractions at the Opera, but excellent performances in every detail were warmly recognised. Mr. McNeill, in Saint-Saëns's Violoncello Concerto, and with Mr. Townsend in compositions by Beethoven and Chopin, showed all the purity of style which we expect from this accomplished violoncello player. Mr. Townsend's solos were a Chopin Etude and a Valse Caprice by Faure.

The great Russian pianist, in a not very well chosen programme, showed no sign of the dozen years which have elapsed since we heard her last. In delicate passages, as well as in the firmest fortissimo, she held her place worthily among the best artists of the day. She was assisted in Liszt's Duo Concertante by her pupil, M. Sapellnikoff.

As in the later visits of the Royal Carl Rosa Company, Mr. Hedmondt's beautiful rendering of the title rôle in "Tannhäuser" was the great attraction, and Mesdames Saville and Duma divided the honours with him in turn. Berlioz's "Faust," staged for the first time in Edinburgh, secured a crowded audience and warm encomiums; but the trump card has been Wagner, whose "Rienzi" (Mr. McGuckin and Miss Meisslinger), "Tannhäuser," and "Lohengrin" were listened to with breathless interest by packed houses. Mr. Alec Marsh deserves all praise as a most artistic Wolfram and a splendid Mephistopheles. The orchestra, under Messrs. Jaquinot and Feld, was the best theatre orchestra we have ever had.

In Perth, a performance of Spohr's "Last Judgment" was given, in St. Ninian's Cathedral, by Mr. Richardson's Choir, on the 5th ult. The work was finely rendered, receiving full justice from the performers. The organ was supplemented by a select orchestra, and the suitable environment deepened the impression. Mr. Richardson, as the Conductor of the Scone Musical Society, has also given a successful performance of Romberg's "Lay of the Bell."

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The annual Concert by the Glasgow Academy Choir, which took place on April 27, showed once more the excellence of the work carried on by Mr. John McLaren, a musician who has always had something good to say for himself during the sixteen years he has wielded the bâton at the Academy. Novelty of a most agreeable order was again prominent, and in Mr. A. R. Gaul's "Una" the Conductor had a cantata very well within the powers of his vocal forces. The work was well sung throughout, more particularly the exhilarating chorus of Peasant Labourers, Una's fluent air "O love will love," the jocund strains to be found in the chorus of Satyrs, and the remarkably vocal quartet towards the close of the cantata. The miscellaneous part of the programme also proved singularly enjoyable. Much valuable aid was given during the evening by Mrs. McLaren, whose pianoforte accompaniments could hardly have been better played. On the 4th ult. the Kelvinside Academy Concert took place, when Mr. Allan Macbeth introduced to his audience Mr. Gustav Ernest's melodious cantata "All the Year round." Here again the choristers gave ample proof of careful tuition, and it should be added that sound musical taste pervaded the selections brought forward in the second part of the programme. Principal Macbeth's programme at the Athenæum, on the evening of the 12th ult., was also in excellent taste. It included, for example, Reinecke's cantata "The Enchanted Swans," for female voices, with accompaniments for pianoforte, harp, violoncello, and horns. A reader is also employed, and altogether the work is replete with interest. The performance was uniformly good, a distinct advance, it ought indeed to be said, on any previous experience.

The Spring opera season at the Theatre Royal terminated on the 5th ult., with a magnificent performance by the Royal Carl Rosa Company of "Tannhäuser." This was the third time that Wagner's work had been given during the engagement, and on each occasion the theatre was crowded. "Lohengrin" also found marked favour, but "Rienzi" failed to rouse any particular enthusiasm. Considerable curiosity attended the solitary performance of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," a work well known here in its cantata form and not likely to be favourably remembered in any other dress.

The programme submitted by M. Sapellnikoff and Madame Sophie Menter, at their Recital on the 17th ult., included Liszt's fearful and wonderful "Concerto Pathétique" for two pianofortes. Anything more bizarre could hardly be imagined, and the composition was a hard nut to crack after the delightful examples of Chopin, which the Russian pianist gave, by the way, with rare artistic perception of their many beauties. The exposition of Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata" by M. Sapellnikoff was somewhat tame. Madame Menter's solos were limited to the Schubert-Liszt "Ave Maria" and the "Erl-King," and for which she was several times recalled.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

Whatever differences of opinion may exist in regard to the artistic side of the question, there can be only one concerning the annual balance-sheet and financial report of the Philharmonic Society, which shows a surplus of over £400. In the course of the meeting, at which the document in question was submitted to the proprietors, it was explained that more costly artists had not been engaged during the past season, presumably because of the expense of building new gallery exits to the hall; and stress was laid upon the important work done by band and chorus. These remarks would have been more acceptable to the general public had the two great musical factors of such a Society really had more important tasks allotted to them during their latest period of service. In the meantime the cordial votes of thanks recorded in favour of Sir Charles Hallé and Mr. H. A. Branscombe were richly deserved, for whatever has been undertaken has been thoroughly well done.

The Nonconformist Choir Union, established in London some time ago, has spread its ramifications to Liverpool, with the result that a one-day Festival has been decided upon in the second city as a sequence to that which will be held in the Crystal Palace on the 9th inst. A large number of choirs have enrolled, and the sectional rehearsals have proved that the material to hand is of a very high order of merit. The total muster of singers recruited by Mr. Edwards, the energetic secretary, is expected to register 500 voices, the local Festival will probably be held in St. George's Hall, and Mr. Minshall, who has been the pioneer of this excellent movement, will conduct.

The members of the North-Western Section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians held high Festival in Liverpool, on April 27, when their hundredth regular meeting took place, under the chairmanship of Mr. Dawber, the founder of this important organisation. Sir John Stainer lent special dignity to the occasion both by his presence and by the reading of an admirable paper on the present position of the musical profession. The only cloud which shaded the proceedings was that occasioned by the resignation of Dr. Hunt, who from considerations of health has been compelled to abandon the position of Sectional Secretary. As his successor pro tem., Mr. W. D. Hall generously consented to take up this position, and the late secretary was with acclamation elected as chairman for this month's meeting, in which business will be combined with pleasure at Blackpool.

One of the chief musical appointments of this city has been rendered vacant by the resignation of Mr. W. D. Hall, who for about twenty years has so admirably ruled the musical destinies of the school for the blind, and acted as Organist of the affiliated Chapel, and whose place it will be difficult to fill. The salary offered to present applicants is £130 a year, and the duties consist of two hours' teaching each day, together with the usual Sunday duties.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

May 1 is a favourite day for the School Festivals in this district, and the various towns vie with each other in presenting attractive programmes. Mr. Speakman, of the Shelton National Schools, aided by his colleagues, gave a most enjoyable entertainment at the Victoria Hall, Hanley. At Burslem, Mr. J. A. McGregor, the music instructor of the School Board, holds himself responsible for a varied programme. Over 200 selected school children sang part-songs and glees, while the Milton scholars (under the direction of Mr. T. Lowe) gave selections from "Prairie Life" and the dramatic cantata "King Alfred." The Town Hall was crowded with a large and enthusiastic audience.

The North Staffordshire Tonic Sol-fa Association held its quarterly meeting at the Tabernacle Lecture Hall, Hanley, on the 7th ult. In the evening the members rendered glees, and Miss Lonsdale and Messrs. Forrester and Richards contributed solos. A few short speeches upon the aims of the Association completed the programme.

Tunstall owes a debt of gratitude to Sir Smith Child for his great liberality in aiding the educational and musical growth of the town. The Sir Smith Child Choral Society gave Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" on the 10th ult., and the Committee, aided by a large donation from the founder, determined to engage competent soloists and a good orchestra. The chorus, numbering about 120, was well balanced, and sang the dramatic "Stone him to death" with vigour, reflecting great credit upon the Conductor, Mr. J. Alcock. The soloists were Miss Ada Lee, Mrs. Eardley, Mr. Riley Walker, and Mr. Harrison. The orchestra rendered excellent service, and the Rev. P. Stowers presided at the organ.

The members of the Burslem Amateur Operatic Society, under the leadership of Mr. R. Parker, gave selections from the most popular of Gilbert and Sullivan's operas, in the Town Hall, on the 17th and 18th ult. The principal vocalists were Mrs. J. W. Munro, Misses Burgess, Steele, Wood, Marsh; and Messrs. Guest, Hartley, E. E. and W. T. Emery. The Hanley Orchestral Society, under Mr. T. Turnock, rendered valuable aid.

MUSIC IN WILTS AND HANTS.

Musical matters have been fairly active in this district during the past month. The Salisbury Vocal Union inaugurated its fifteenth season with an Invitation Concert, given in the Assembly Rooms, under the direction of Mr. J. M. Hayden, the Conductor of the Society. The programme, which consisted chiefly of glees and part-songs, was admirably carried out, and there was a large attendance. I must also notice the Concert given by the Downton Musical Society—a Society established two years ago by the Countess of Radnor. A selection from Mendelssohn's "Saint Paul," and Macfarren's cantata "May Day" had been chosen for performance, and under the conductorship of Lady Radnor received an excellent rendering. Her ladyship, who does much to encourage musical work in the neighbourhood, was loudly cheered on her appearance with the bâton, which she has wielded so successfully on many more ambitious occasions. The Concert was a complete success. On Ascension Day the usual selection from "Elijah" was given in Salisbury Cathedral to a very large congregation. Messrs. Hayden and Tyack sang the tenor and bass solos, and in the quartets were joined by Mr. Payne and one of the chorister boys. The choruses were sung by the Cathedral choir, and Mr. South (whose return to his duties after a prolonged absence, on account of ill-health, is hailed with much satisfaction) played the accompaniments on the organ with his customary skill.

A great Choral Festival, in which nearly a hundred choirs participated, took place in Salisbury Cathedral, on the 10th ult. The service aroused great public interest, and a vast congregation filled the building to overflowing. The setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, by Dr. Harford Lloyd, and the fine anthem, "Hear my words, ye people," by Dr. Hubert Parry, had both been composed for the occasion, and were admirably sung; the effect of the body of 2,000 voices, reinforced by wind instruments, being very impressive. The solo portions of the anthem were sung by members of the Cathedral choir, and the semi-chorus, for which much of Dr. Parry's splendid music is written, was composed of 400 selected singers. Gounod's chorus "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," from "The Redemption," was sung at the end of the service with marked effect. The Rev. H. W. Carpenter, Minor Canon of the Cathedral, intoned the service and conducted the greater part of the music. Dr. Parry conducted his own anthem and the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Dr. Lloyd, although present at the rehearsal, being compelled to return to Oxford in the morning. Mr. South's fine playing was a marked feature of the Festival, and the band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry did good service in supplementing the accompaniment of the organ. The Festival was a grand success, and the Diocesan Choral Association, under whose auspices the great gathering took place, should be congratulated upon having once more furnished encouraging evidence of the progress of its work.

Morning and evening Concerts were given by the Bitterne Choral Society on the 9th ult., when Sullivan's Oratorio "The Prodigal Son" and Anderton's cantata "The Norman Baron" were performed. The solo vocalists were Miss Newton Spicer, Mrs. J. Jenkins, Mr. S. M. Boyle, and the Rev. H. J. Freeman, all of whom acquitted themselves admirably. The chorus numbered forty voices and there was an efficient orchestra. Mr. J. W. Nash-Brown conducted.

The Southampton Musical Union gave its concluding Concert of the season in the Lamb Memorial Hall on the 11th ult., when an excellent programme was submitted. Additional interest was given to the occasion by the announcement that Mr. Alexander Rowland, the founder of the Society, would make his final appearance as Conductor. Mr. Rowland has been unfortunately compelled by increasing years and delicate health to sever his connection with the Musical Union, and will, for the rest of his professional life, devote himself entirely to teaching.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

On April 24 a Chamber Concert of much more than ordinary interest was given at Wakefield by three young English artists: Miss Edith Ferguson being the violinist, Mr. John St. O. Dykes the pianist, and Mr. Arthur F. Ferguson the vocalist of the party. Rheinberger's Pianoforte and Violin Sonata (Op. 77) and Schubert's well known "Rondo brilliant" were the concerted pieces, and Mr. Dykes showed his technical achievement and good taste in Mendelssohn's "Variations sérieuses" and pieces by Thalberg, Liszt, and Paderewski. His greatest success was, however, in a Nocturne and Ballade of Chopin, which seemed to inspire him with an unusual degree of poetical feeling. The most interesting, because the least hackneyed part of the programme was the series of seven songs sung by Mr. Ferguson, who gave examples of Schumann, Brahms, Grieg, as well as works of very decided merit by less known composers—J. F. Duggan, E. Walker, and W. G. Winfield—every one of which had the charm of either absolute or comparative novelty.

For its size Whitby would appear to be by no means devoid of musical enterprise. The Whitby Choral Society, of which Mr. Hallgate is the able honorary Conductor, gave a Concert on the 8th ult., the programme of which was of greater account than "miscellaneous" programmes are wont to be. Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen," Gade's "Spring's Message," a series of pieces from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and Mr. N. Kilburn's Choral Psalm, "The Lord is my Shepherd," were the most important things given. Of these, Gade's "Ode" and Mr. Kilburn's Psalm were new to Whitby—the latter having the advantage of the composer's conductorship and meeting with very general approval. It was of course inevitable that the band should be incomplete in the wind department—the impossibility of securing a properly equipped orchestra is the greatest hindrance to music in provincial England—but the Rev. A. D'Hooghe, and Messrs. Hallgate and Kilburn managed among them to do all that was possible to supply deficiencies on pianoforte and harmonium, so that the performances were creditably smooth. The principal vocalists were Miss Effie Thomas, Mr. Edward Kemp, and Mr. W. Riley.

The Leeds Symphony Society, under Mr. A. J. Gutfeld's direction, gave its fifth Orchestral Concert on the 7th ult. The choice of Schubert's great Symphony in C major indicated that the Society was not devoid of pluck; and while the performance was at least creditable, the satisfaction which the members must have experienced in studying so great a work fully accounted for the ambition shown in their selection. Mr. Max Blume played Bennett's beautiful Pianoforte Concerto in F minor very artistically, and Miss Brigg displayed a most agreeable voice and a cultivated and refined style in "Solveig's Song," from Grieg's "Peer Gynt" music, and a couple of French songs.

The newly established Bridlington Musical Society gave its first Concert on the 10th ult. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" formed the first part of the programme, the second part being miscellaneous, the performance of the "Tannhäuser" Overture by a "scratch" band showing that the Society has at least the courage that should belong to youth. The choral singing was full of spirit, but the fact that the ladies outnumbered the gentlemen by more than two to one greatly interfered with the proper balance of tone. The soloists were Miss Marie Graham, Mrs. Bosvile, and Mr. Winsloe Hall. Mr. Bosvile was the Conductor.

MUSIC IN MONTREAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On the evening of April 10 last, at the Windsor Hall, the Mendelssohn Choir, under its veteran leader, Mr. Joseph Gould, gave its farewell Concert. That such a fine Society, whilst in the flower of its prosperity, should decide to disband is a matter of great regret; but owing to failing health, the Society's first and only Conductor, Mr. J. Gould, finds himself compelled to lay aside his bâton, and the members will know no other leader, but prefer to end their labours with his. The Society has always been very select, its Concerts being given only to subscribers and to the friends of the choir members; but an exception was made at this last Concert to give many musical people of Montreal, who had never heard the choir, an opportunity of being present at the farewell performance. Having heard nearly every Concert given by the Mendelssohn Choir during the past ten years, I am able to say that the choir never sang with greater spirit and accuracy than upon this occasion. The extraneous attractions were Herr Josef Slivinski (pianist) and the Welsh tenor, Mr. Ben Davies. Your readers will be prepared to hear that Mr. Davies received an ovation. He was in splendid voice, and his dramatic style quite won the hearts of his large audience.

The Montreal Orchestral Association gave its first Concert in the Windsor Hall on April 12. This is a band of local musicians, mostly amateur, and their performance on this occasion won for them the general approval of the audience. Being their first attempt in public, the Conductor, Mr. Reyner, wisely selected music of a simple nature, and the renderings of Mendelssohn's March from "Athalie," Edward German's music to "Henry VIII." (Three Dances), and Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony were distinctly artistic. They were assisted by Miss Maud Burdette (contralto), Mr. Ernest Alexander (tenor), and Mr. Closset (violoncellist), all local artists. The audience was large and enthusiastic, and it is hoped that the management may feel encouraged to continue the work of the Association next season.

The fifth annual Festival of the Philharmonic Society, which consisted of three evening Concerts and one Matinée, took place on April 17, 18, and 19, at the Windsor Hall. The increasing popularity of the Society's Concerts is sufficient evidence that the public taste for high-class music is gradually being improved. The Concerts which have this season been such a pronounced success would, a few years ago, have failed to attract sufficient attention to save the Society from bankruptcy. It is unfortunately the case that this season, as in all past seasons, the committee have been called upon to make good a small deficit; but the recent expenditure was more than double that of, say, seven years ago, when the deficit was larger. The chief items of expense were for orchestra and soloists. The Society secured for the occasion the Boston Festival Orchestra of forty, and their work was well-nigh perfect. The soloists were Miss Irene Pevny and Miss Marie Hollinshead, of Montreal (sopranos), Madame Clara Poole-King and Miss M. Burdette (contraltos), Mr. W. H. Rieger (tenor), Mr. W. Ludwig (baritone), and Mr. Conrad Behrens (bass). The chorus numbered 250, and their splendid singing gave clear proof of faithful attendance at many rehearsals. The greatest triumph ever achieved by the Society was the really fine performance of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" in concert form; the Conductor, Mr. G. Couture, is to be congratulated upon the masterly manner in which he carried this work through. The first Concert was devoted entirely to works by Grieg. The principal number was "Olav Trygvason," and other numbers of interest were "At the Cloister Gate," "Norwegian Dances," and the baritone solo with orchestral accompaniment, "Der Einsame," sung by Mr. Ludwig. The Concert-Overture "In Autumn" also formed part of the programme. The Matinée Concert consisted of orchestral selections and vocal and instrumental solos; of the former, the principal were "Joyeuse Marche," by Chabrier; "La Farandole," by Dubois; Adagio and Gavotte, by Bach; and Suite in A minor, by McDowell, the American composer.

The programme of the second evening Concert contained compositions by Mendelssohn and Liszt. The Mendelssohn selections were Overture "Ruy Blas," "Scotch" Symphony, and "The First Walpurgis Night." Mr. Arthur Friedheim played Liszt's Concerto (No. 1) in E flat, with orchestra, conducted by Mr. Emil Mollenhauer. Mr. Friedheim made his début at Montreal on this occasion, and was much applauded for the manner in which he played this difficult composition.

These Concerts were not so fully appreciated as their merits deserved, the public having reserved themselves for the pièce de résistance, the "Flying Dutchman." When Mr. Couture appeared to conduct Wagner's opera there was not a vacant seat in the hall, and over fifty people paid for the privilege of standing up to hear it. The difficult Overture was well rendered, and the duets between Daland and the Dutchman in the first act were splendidly sung by Messrs. Ludwig and Behrens; but it was reserved for the female portion of the choir in the Spinning Chorus at the beginning of the second act to arouse the enthusiasm of the audience by their accuracy of attack and the purity and volume of their tone. Miss Pevny, as Senta, sang with great feeling and with a thorough knowledge of the part, for which her brilliant and powerful voice is specially adapted. The male choruses in the third act were sung with great vigour, volume, and precision.

We are glad to record some improvement in the performances at the third Concert given by the Musical Artists' Society, in St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 21st ult. The playing in the string quartets offended less through impure intonation, but there was room for further improvement as regards refinement, quality of tone, and ensemble. The programme included a String Quartet in G, by Miss Oliveria Prescott. It bears the title "Be happy," and the music is accordingly of a cheerful and pleasing character. We know not whether it made the audience happy; to us it seemed to lack many of the qualities necessary to produce this desirable effect. The themes are not remarkable for nobility or originality, and only once, in the slow movement, does the composer make an attempt to become impressive. We felt much happier in listening to Mr. Algernon Ashton's exhilarating Irish Dances for pianoforte duet, which reveal a first-rate musician on every page. The final Presto, especially, is a capital piece, full of gaiety and ésprit and remarkably effective. They were excellently played by Miss Edith O. Greenhill and the composer. We regret we cannot speak favourably of Mr. W. H. Speer's String Quartet in B flat. The composer takes his art very seriously to judge from this work, but good intentions alone will not, unfortunately, produce a good string quartet. Mr. René Ortmanns and Miss Ada L. Boden gave a good performance of a sombre, but impressive Andante and a less interesting Scherzo, by Miss E. A. Chamberlayne. Miss Florence Monk and Miss Vena Galbraith sang two taking and musicianly duets, "Fair Daffodils" and "The Spring-time," by Mr. F. J. Simpson; and Miss Galbraith's carefully trained and sympathetic contralto was heard to great advantage in a song by Meyer Helmund. Miss Bertha Sladdin's appearance as a singer on a public platform was premature, to say the least. Mr. Walter Macfarren's very Mendelssohnian second Sonata for pianoforte and violin received a careful and effective interpretation at the hands of Misses Maude Wilson and Ethel Barns. Messrs. Buziau, Kornfeld, Conti, and Belinski formed the string quartet.

THE Musical Union, under the late John Ella, was one of the most esteemed London Concert Institutions, and another enterprise with the same title was started by M. Johannes Wolff, at St. James's Hall, on Monday, the 21st ult. French art was wholly represented on this occasion, the Parisian organist and composer, Mr. Widor, being the hero of the afternoon. He was represented by a Pianoforte Quartet in A minor, four expressive songs, well interpreted by Mr. Oudin, three duet pieces for pianoforte and violoncello, and a brief Quintet for pianoforte, harmonium, flute, violin, and violoncello. His music is not particularly French in character, savouring of Teutonic influences; but very earnest, and therefore worthy of more attention than can possibly be given to it at the present busy time. A graceful and generally effective Pianoforte Trio in A minor, by Miss Chaminade, and three songs from the same pen, the latter nicely sung by Madame Julia Wyman, were included in the programme. The executants, in addition to Mr. Widor and Miss Chaminade, included Messrs. Van Waefelghem, Delsart, Aitken, and W. L. Barrett. The second Concert, in which Mr. Saint-Saëns will take part, is fixed for Thursday, the 7th inst.

MISS AGNES BARTLETT, a pianist of considerable ability, must be complimented upon the interesting selection of pieces at her Concert in the small Queen's Hall on the 16th ult. Two compositions by René Lenormand were heard for the first time in London, and one of these proved to be a work of exceptional merit. This was a Trio in G minor (Op. 30) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. It is in the orthodox four movements, of which the opening Allegro and the Scherzo are particularly remarkable for sustained spirit and effective use of good material. The work was excellently rendered by Miss Agnes Bartlett, Mr. Hans Wessely, and Mr. Alfred Gallrein, and was received with the warmest approval. A refined Adagio for violin from the same pen was successfully played by Mr. Wessely, accompanied by the composer. Miss Bartlett's taste and brilliancy of execution were effectively manifested in a finished performance of Tschaikowsky's Air and Variations (Op. 19, No. 6), and Miss Louise Phillips (a substitute for Mrs. Helen Trust, indisposed) agreeably sang several pieces.

Beachcroft, Worcester, and of Sydenham Hill; William D. Capel, Keble, and of Fulham; Walter H. G. Custard, Queen's, and of St. Leonard's; Frederick M. Darby, Queen's, and of Eastbourne; George Farrant, Queen's, and of Hurstpierpoint; Walter Harrison, New, and of Jersey; Ernest W. Holmyard, New, and of Brighton; Henry N. Stables, non-collegiate, and of Derby; Caroline Moseley. Second Examination for the Degree of Bachelor in Music: R. T. White, Queen's, and of Marden, Kent. The examiners were Sir J. Stainer, Dr. C. Hubert H. Parry, and Dr. P. Armes.

THE annual Meeting of the Tonic Sol-fa College was held in the Queen's Hall on April 24. Mr. Frederic Cowen occupied the chair. The report, presented by Mr. Griffiths, stated that about 20,000 persons were now teaching music by the Tonic Sol-fa method. Of the 3,250,000 elementary school children in England and Wales who earned the grant last year for singing by note, eighty-seven per cent. earned it under this system, showing a five-fold increase in ten years. In Scotland the Sol-fa percentage was ninety-five. There were no statistics to show the progress in other than public elementary schools. Many county councils had carried on adult singing classes, in a large proportion of which the Sol-fa method had been chosen. A selection of choruses, part-songs, &c., was sung by the Bow and Bromley Choir (Mr. W. G. McNaught, Conductor); the South London Choral Association (Mr. L. C. Venables, Conductor); and the Temperance Choral Society (Mr. J. A. Birch, Conductor).

A CONCERT was given at Princes' Hall, on the 15th ult., by Miss Minny Cortese, an American contralto. She sings with much feeling, but in pursuit of expression is too often inclined to conceal the exact pitch of a note in a halo of quarter-tones. This embarrasses the ear. If Miss Cortese can modify this tendency she will be heard with pleasure. She has an engaging presence and her voice is a good one. She was assisted by Miss Alice Ivimey, who played some pianoforte pieces, and by Master Arthur Argiewicz—said to be nine years old, and who cannot, at any rate, be more than eleven or twelve—who played Wieniawski's Violin Concerto in D minor in a way that spoke of gifts of an exceptionally high order. He was also heard, but to less advantage, in pieces by Saint-Saëns and Sarasate. This boy's talent should be allowed to ripen in private—the makings of a very great artist are there. Mr. Plowitz accompanied.

AMONG London choral associations the Laistner Choir bids fair to take a foremost place, and, indeed, it has already done excellent work. At the second public Concert, which was given in St. James's Hall on the 9th ult., Max Bruch's fine and expressive cantata "Das Lied von der Glocke," produced at the Birmingham Festival in 1879, was given for the first time in London. If the work is not destined to oust Romberg's popular setting of Schiller's poem it certainly deserved a hearing, for it ranks higher, from the standpoint of pure musical art, though its vocal difficulties and the necessity for the employment of a large orchestra are against its general acceptance. The work was, on the whole, worthily rendered, under the direction of Herr Max Laistner, and with Miss Fillunger, Miss Olga de Mohl, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. David Bispham as the principal vocalists.

THE Concert given by Mr. W. H. Wing in aid of the Building Fund of the Great Northern Central Hospital, at the Princes' Hall, on the evening of the 5th ult., was rendered interesting by the production of a cantata for solo vocalists, chorus, and orchestra, by Mr. Edward Davey Rendall, bearing the singular title of "Selections from the Compleat Angler; an Idyll in two days, after Izaak Walton." The music is very clever, the composer displaying eclecticism, if not originality; but without the aid of the score detailed notice is impossible. Recitation between the numbers was effectively delivered by Mr. Kirwan, and the general performance by a competent orchestra and chorus, with Miss Gertrude Sichel, Miss Louise Phillips, and Messrs. E. Iles, J. Leyland, MacDonnell, and Marriott in solo parts was highly satisfactory.

A VERY successful Concert was given by the members of the Somerset House Orchestral Society on the 8th ult., at Westminster Town Hall. The orchestral portion of the programme, which was interpreted in a highly commendable manner under the able direction of Mr. James Connah, comprised Schubert's "Rosamunde" Overture, the Andante and Allegro (Finale) from Mozart's Symphony, No. 9; Gounod's "Marche Solennelle," Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," German's Dances in "Henry VIII.," and short pieces by Reinecke and Eilenberg. Miss Amalie Brousson was heard in successful association with Messrs. Spencer West and H. Hancock in the Serenade from Berlioz's "L'enfance du Christ" for harp and two flutes. Songs were contributed by Miss Clorinda Thurtle, and Mr. J. H. Maunder accompanied.

THE 156th anniversary Banquet of the Royal Society of Musicians took place at the Hôtel Métropole on the 17th ult., Prince Henry of Battenberg presiding. A large number of gentlemen eminent in the world of music, and representative of other arts, were present, among the speakers being the Lord Mayor, Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, Mr. Alfred Gilbert, R.A., and Mr. Stuart-Wortley, M.P. During the evening an excellent programme of music was rendered by Miss Ella Russell, Mrs. Helen Trust, Mr. Leo Stern (violoncello), Mr. Frederick Griffiths (flute), Mr. Edward German, Mr. Fountain Meen, Miss Bessie Waugh, and the Queen Vocal Quartet, consisting of Miss Amy Sargent, Miss Isabel Wyatt, Miss Stanley Lucas, and Miss Lucie Johnstone.

The Bermondsey Settlement Choral and Orchestral Union gave a successful performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" at the local Town Hall on the 3rd ult., with Madame Clara Samuell, Miss Amy Wood, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Robert Grice as soloists. Though but two years in existence, the Association already boasts a membership of considerably over a hundred, and the performance on this occasion exhibited both earnestness and ability. Particularly commendable was the rendering of the choral passages in the scene of the Conversion and of that melodious gem "How lovely are the messengers," whilst justice was also done to the more vigorous choruses. The bâton was in the skilful hands of Mr. John C. Borland, who deserves great credit for the smoothness with which the Oratorio was gone through.

The members of the London Diocesan Choral Union, Branch II., gave their first Concert on the 19th ult., at the Bow and Bromley Institute. The first part of the programme was devoted to Page's cantata "The Sea King's Daughter," the solos of which were sung by Miss Emily Davies, Miss Jannings, and Mr. Francis Lloyd. In part 2, which was miscellaneous, Miss Adela Drayton was successful in her recitation of a scene from "The Hunchback," as was also Miss Walenn in her performance of a Ballade and Polonaise, by Vieuxtemps; and the members of the Choral Union sang several part-songs. The performance was conducted by Mr. Edward G. Croager, who also played pianoforte solos by E. Cutler and B. Godard.

An "Invisible Musical Performance" was given at Queen's (small) Hall, on the 22nd ult., by Mr. J. H. Bonawitz, assisted by Miss C. A. Brousil, Miss Armitage, Mrs. Schreiber, Mrs. K. Bartholomew; Messrs. H. Lait, E. Krall, and Hahn. Pieces and songs by Haydn, Beethoven, Handel, Chopin, Liszt, and the Concert-giver were given by these artists, singly and in various combinations, all being performed behind a screen. The audience saw nothing on the platform but plants and flowers against a background of black and yellow, save when, for a few moments, Mr. E. F. Jacques appeared to explain the advantages of hearing music without seeing the performers of it. How far his audience were convinced it is impossible to say.

Signor S. Scuderi, at his Concert at Steinway Hall on April 30, was prominent as composer, as vocalist, and as instrumental executant. The first two capacities were simultaneously manifested in "Elsa, sing on," and "Thine to the last," each of these songs meeting with a favourable reception. To other vocalists were also entrusted pieces from his pen. As a violin soloist Signor Scuderi was heard in short works by well-known composers, and joined Miss Annie Burgher in an efficient rendering of Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata. He likewise played on the guitar. Mr. Oscar Noyes, an English baritone with a good voice and style, was encored in the serenade from "Don Giovanni" and Rossini's "La Danza." The Misses Edith Wehner and Delves Norton took part in the vocal portion.

The Misses Kate and Fanny Woolt offered high-class works at their Concert at 12, Portman Square, on the 8th ult. They were associated with Mr. E. Woolhouse in a neat performance of Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor (Op. 66, No. 2) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, and Miss Kate Woolf joined Mr. Woolhouse in an expressive rendering of the same composer's "Variations Concertantes" for pianoforte and violoncello. Miss Fanny Woolf's ability as a violinist was effectively exhibited in Vieuxtemps's "Air Varié" and Papini's "Saltarella," and Miss Kate Woolf had for pianoforte solos pieces by Bizet, Chopin, and Paderewski. Mr. Norman Salmond sang with success Rubinstein's "The Wish" and Gounod's "If thou art sleeping."

A Concert was given at Lordship Lane Public Hall, on the 7th ult., by Mr. Ernest E. Vinen. There was a full orchestra and chorus, numbering ninety, led by Herr Ferdinand Hartung, the chief feature in the programme being a selection from Gade's interesting cantata "The Crusaders," the solos being sung by Mr. Harry Marriott and Mr. Robert Grice. The Concert-giver played Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, Melodie (Paderewski), and Valse Chromatique (Godard), besides acting as Conductor. Songs were contributed by Miss Edith Hands and Mr. H. Marriott, and the admirable playing, by Mr. T. E. Gatehouse, of Vieuxtemps's Polonaise, and other violin solos met with due recognition.

On the 7th ult. the choir of St. Mark's, Notting Hill, gave their annual Concert in the Parish Room in aid of the choir fund, and the occasion was marked by the presentation of a testimonial, in the shape of a handsome marble clock, to the late Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. Warren Tear. The Vicar (Rev. W. E. Emmett), in presenting the testimonial, expressed on behalf of the congregation their hearty appreciation of his untiring and painstaking efforts, and also bore testimony to the high state of efficiency to which he had raised the musical services of the church. Mr. Tear (who is now fulfilling the duties of Organist and Choirmaster at St. Mark's, Kennington) suitably acknowledged the gift.

More than usual interest was attached to music at Mr. Charles Fry's Recital on the 10th ult., at the small Queen's Hall. It included Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's incidental music to "The Dream of Eugene Aram" and Schumann's music to a scene from Byron's "Manfred," which, with several appropriate selections, were artistically played by a small band, screened from the view of the audience. The excellence of these musical settings greatly enhanced the effect of Mr. Fry's elocutionary skill. In the scenes from "Manfred" and "The Hunchback," Mr. Fry received most able assistance from Miss Olive Kennett, a lady who also in several recitations showed great talent and dramatic power, combined with an excellent style.

The St. Andrew's Musical Society gave its final Concert for the season at the Church Schools, Roupell Street, Lambeth, on the 2nd ult. The programme included Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God," "Hear my Prayer," and "How lovely are the messengers," and Haydn's "The heavens are telling." Solos selected exclusively from the Oratorios were ably sung by Miss Ida F. Price, Miss Hannah Homer, Miss Annie Northcroft, Mr. A. Condy, Mr. E. F. Humphry, Mr. Charles Constable, and Mr. F. Harold Hankins. Pianoforte solos were contributed by Mr. Rowland Briant. The accompanists were Miss Louie Ankers and Mr. F. Harold Hankins, and Mr. G. Graham Newstead conducted.

The West Hampstead Choral and Orchestral Society gave its second Concert of the season on the 2nd ult., at the West Hampstead Town Hall, when Gaul's cantata "Joan of Arc" was performed. The soloists were Miss Emily Davies, Mr. Francis Lloyd, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, all of whom were successful. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous; the orchestra played a first movement from a Symphony of Haydn; Miss Maude Barker (a pupil of Mr. Edward G. Croager) won much applause for her singing, Miss Adela Drayton recited, the Cynthia Quartet sang some humorous glees, and the Choral Society sang Baumer's "Bells of Oberwesel." Mr. Edward G. Croager conducted.

Miss Maud MacCarthy, ten years of age, made her début as violinist at the Princes' Hall on the 16th ult. She first played in Bach's Sonata in A, with Miss Carmichael at the pianoforte, and displayed intelligence and feeling quite remarkable in one so young, and a calmness of manner, evidently the result, not of a cold nature, but of absorption. In De Beriot's "Scène de Bal" she showed great vigour and command of the fingerboard. She has not in any way been forced; and, further, will now, we are glad to learn, return to her studies, to fulfil the promise which she gives of becoming a truly great artist. Songs were contributed by Mrs. MacCarthy and pianoforte solos by Miss Hirschfeld.

THE Dedication Festival at St. Philip's, Queen's Road, Battersea, took place on Sunday, the 6th ult. The Canticles used at Matins were Calkin in G, followed by Eyre's Communion Service in E flat, "Blessed are they that dwell" (Tours) being sung as the Introit. The music at Evensong included an Organ Recital, from 6.30 till 7 p.m.; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, by Smart, in B flat; anthems, "The trumpet shall sound" and "Lift up your heads" (Handel); selection from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," after the Blessing. Two violin solos, with organ, Allegro Brillant (Réne Ortmann) and Andante Religioso (T. Hame), were played as voluntaries.

MADAME ADELINA PATTI drew a large audience to the Royal Albert Hall on the 19th ult., when she re-appeared after her prosperous tour in America. The famous prima donna, who was in excellent voice, added to some of the very familiar pieces in her répertoire Wagner's "Träume." The reception of the piece was so enthusiastic that Madame Patti repeated it, to the delight of her hearers, instead of giving another air. Madame Amy Sherwin, Miss Dews, the Misses Eissler, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and the Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir (conducted by Madame Clara Novello Davies) also appeared. The choralists were extremely successful in national melodies.

ON April 26 an agreeable Chamber Concert was given at St. James's Hall by Signor Simonetti. The able Italian violinist was heard as a soloist in Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's picturesque "Highland Ballad," in the rendering of which he displayed refined taste and expression. The Concert opened with his elegantly-written Pianoforte and Violin Sonata in C minor, and another feature worthy of mention was Brahms's set of Gipsy Songs (Op. 112), the vocal parts in which received full justice from Miss Louise Phillips, Miss Agnes Janson, Mr. W. Shakespeare, and Mr. David Bispham. Miss Fanny Davies contributed much towards the success of the Concert.

THE young artists forming the Musical Guild displayed laudable enterprise in beginning their new season with an important novelty—viz., Mr. Eugen d'Albert's first String Quartet in A minor (Op. 7). The performance of this terribly trying work, by Messrs. Arthur Bent, W. Sutcliffe, A. Hobday, and Paul Ludwig, was excellent, and these artists were rewarded by a hearty recall. The remainder of the programme consisted of Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 109), carefully played by Miss Maggie Moore; some songs, sung with much charm of voice and style by Madame de Fonblanque; and Beethoven's String Quartet in F (Op. 59).

ON the 7th ult. the Arundel Male-Voice Choir gave a successful Smoking Concert at the Covent Garden Hotel, Southampton Street, Strand. The choir, under the direction of Mr. Robert P. Hast, performed with marked success the following music: "Integer vitæ" (Fleming), "Fisherman's Song" (Raff), "The long day closes" (Sullivan), "Thor's War Song" (Maunder), "Health to my dear" (Spofforth), "Night Song" (Mendelssohn), "The Homeward Watch" (Smart), "Tar's Song" (Hatton), and "Farewell Meeting" (Mendelssohn). Songs and recitations were also included in the programme.

MISS EDITH HIGGS gave her fourth annual Concert on April 26, at St. Martin's Town Hall, with considerable success. The Concert-giver sang Braga's Serenata (with violoncello obbligato) and "The voice I loved" (Wadham), being encored in both pieces. Miss Higgs was assisted by Miss Emily Davies, Miss Louise Weaver (who has a contralto voice of excellent quality), Mr. Gilbert Thorne, Mr. Henry Ward, and Mr. John Probert (who replaced Mr. Henry Piercy); Miss Samuels (violin), Mr. Jan Mulden (violoncello), and Madame Rossiter (pianoforte). Recitations were given by Mr. Charles Fry.

THE Dedication Festival at St. Stephen's, Haggerstone, was held on the 6th ult. The Communion Service was a setting by A. Sidney Marks in B flat, with full orchestral accompaniment. Offertory, "Blessed are they" (Tours), and Communis, "Ave Verum" (Gounod). After service the first movement from Haydn's Symphony in D (No. 7) was played by the orchestra. Mr. A. Sidney Marks, Organist of the Church, conducted, and Mr. Charles Davis, Organist of Victoria Park Congregational Church, presided at the organ. At Evensong the anthem was "I was glad" (Elvey), and the Canticles, Stainer in F.

THE London County Council Musical Society continues to make satisfactory progress. At the Concert at the Westminster Town Hall, on the 7th ult., creditable displays were made by both the orchestra and chorus under the conductorship of Mr. J. W. Ivimey. The choir earned hearty praise for its firm and precise delivery of Mendelssohn's cantata for male voices "To the Sons of Art," and of Dr. Bridge's telling part-song "The Bold Turpin," the many humorous points in the last-named being very effectively emphasized. Mrs. Helen Trust was at the head of the vocal contributors, and there were some acceptable instrumental solos.

SIR AUGUSTUS HARRIS was presented, on the 11th ult., with the testimonial suggested originally by Mr. Henry Russell. The presentation was made by Sir Edward Lawson in the saloon of Drury Lane Theatre. The testimonial, by the express wish of the recipient, took the form of three Steinway Grand pianofortes, which have been presented to the Royal College, the Royal Academy, and the Guildhall School of Music, Sir Augustus Harris receiving also a beautifully illuminated album containing the list of operas performed, the artists engaged under his management, and other details.

THE Concert given by the Tonic Sol-fa Composition Club at 186, Aldersgate Street, on the 5th ult., was very successful. Considerable advance in instrumental writing was apparent in the numbers composed for string quartet, notably a first movement by Mr. W. S. Desborough. Conspicuous for their broad, vigorous effect were Nixon's chorus "Forward" and Merritt's "Lift up your hearts." The more delicate numbers were Facer's trio, "Rest, weary warrior"; Rees's part-song, "O flow'rets sweet"; and Miss Donovan's song, "Voices."

MR. TOBIAS A. MATTHAY gave a Pianoforte Recital, interspersed with vocal music, at Trinity College, London, on the 7th ult., his programme being drawn from the works of various composers. The more delicate characteristics of Schumann and Chopin were expressively brought out in a series of pieces by these masters, and throughout Mr. Matthay's performances were received with close attention. Mrs. Tobias Matthay rendered with refinement songs by Gluck, Jensen, Lassen, and others, to the pianoforte accompaniment played by Miss Dora Matthay.

ANOTHER prodigy, Bronislaw Huberman, was heard at Queen's Hall on the 1st ult. He plays the violin quite marvellously for so young a child; he is about ten, and should therefore not go about giving Recitals, but continue studying till he becomes a great artist, which no little boy with immature feelings can possibly be, however wonderful his performances may appear. His playing of a Bach Prelude and of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto showed an aptitude in every way remarkable. Mr. Ganz played the pianoforte accompaniments with customary tact.

WE have to chronicle the appearance of yet another amateur orchestra—viz., that of the Great Northern Railway Orchestral Society, which gave its first public Concert at St. Martin's Town Hall on April 28. It would, of course, be unreasonable to expect refinement and finish from a newly-formed amateur band; these qualities will come with experience. We may, however, give the young Society and its Conductor, Mr. Charles Evans, a word of commendation for the sonority of the ensemble and for their good intentions generally. The new Society is welcome!

THE Hornsey and Crouch End Orchestral Society concluded its third season with a very successful Concert on the 7th ult., at the National Hall, Hornsey. The programme was an ambitious one, the works performed being the Overtures to "Ruy Blas" and "Masaniello," Symphony in C minor (Beethoven), and the March from "Tannhäuser." Mr. Réné Payne gave a good reading of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, and also acted in the capacity of leader. The vocalist was Miss Kate Drew. Mr. Henry J. Baker conducted with his accustomed clearness and decision.

The Kyrle Choir performed Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," on the 2nd ult., at Little Portland Street Chapel. The soloists were Miss Annie Lawrie, Miss Rina Robinson, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Henry Baker. On the 9th ult. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was given by the same choir at Christ Church, Watney Street. The soloists were Mrs. H. W. Johnson, Mrs. S. N. Hubble, Mr. Herbert Clinch, and Mr. Arthur Wills. Mr. F. A. W. Docker conducted on both occasions, and Dr. Turpin presided at the organ.

The North-West Philharmonic Society gave a successful performance of "Elijah" at the Constitutional Club, Harlesden, on April 26, under the direction of Mr. J. L. Phillips. The solo vocalists were Miss Una Bruckshaw, Miss Louise Weaver, Mr. Miles Moley, and Mr. Thomas Kempton. Miss Una Bruckshaw was very successful in the air, "Hear ye, Israel," and Miss Louise Weaver was loudly applauded for her sympathetic rendering of "O rest in the Lord." The chorus and orchestra numbered one hundred.

The second Concert of the Sydenham Orchestral Society was given on April 25, at the Park Hall. Miss Jeanne Levine was the solo violinist, and Madame Joyce Maas and Mr. Charles Hall were the vocalists. Mr. G. S. Minson accompanied, and the orchestra was conducted by Mr. A. M. Hughes. The works performed were Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Prout's Suite de Ballet, Introduction and Rondo for violin and orchestra by Saint-Saëns, the Overture to "Der Freischütz," and the Coronation March from "Le Prophète."

The St. George's Glee Union gave a Concert on the 4th ult., when Coward's cantata "Fishers" was performed, with Misses Maud Bond and Mary Tunnicliffe and Messrs. Lewis Frederick and Fred Bevan as the soloists. The composer added considerably to the success of the Concert by his splendid performance on the Mustel Organ and the enthusiasm he infused into the choir. A short miscellaneous part closed the Concert. Mr. F. R. Kinkee accompanied, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted, as usual.

An exceedingly creditable performance of "Carmen" was given, on the 25th ult., at Drury Lane Theatre, by the Students of the Guildhall School of Music, under Sir Joseph Barnby. The representatives of the chief parts showed much intelligence, and the stage management was excellent. A really adequate performance of such an opera as "Carmen" by students is, of course, an impossibility; but, short of this, the Guildhall "Carmen" must be acknowledged a remarkable effort.

The Ascension Day service at Westminster Abbey was more than usually interesting. The complete choir of eighteen men and twenty boys attended, and the music included a selection from "The Redemption" and Dr. Bridge's Motet "The Lord's Prayer." During the Collection Handel's Largo was performed, the combination of the harp, played by Mr. John Thomas, and some of the beautiful solo stops of the Abbey organ having a particularly charming effect.

Mrs. Clarinda Webster's Mendelssohn Concert, on the 10th ult., in the small Queen's Hall, was largely attended. The programme included a comprehensive selection from the master's chamber music, which was effectively rendered by Miss Margaret Hoare, Mr. Iver McKay, and the Walenn String Quartet party, and between the parts an instructive and thoughtful paper on the life and influence of the composer was read by Mrs. Webster.

At Union Chapel, Islington, an excellent performance of "Judas Maccabæus" was given on April 25, the principal vocalists being Miss Emily Davies, Miss Emily Saunders, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Arthur Barlow. The choruses were carefully sung by the members of the Psalmody Class, under the conductorship of Mr. Robert Williamson, and Mr. Fountain Meen presided at the organ, as usual.

At the church of St. Barnabas, Kentish Town, a performance was given, on the 8th ult., of the second part of "St. Paul." On the whole the choruses were effectively rendered. The solo music was sung by Master Stanley Smith, Mr. J. H. Haysman, and Mr. Shakespeare Stewart, to each of whom great credit is due. The Vicar of St. Barnabas conducted, and Mr. George S. Pinches ably presided at the organ.

The nineteenth annual Concert of the Merchant Taylors' School Choral Society was given, on the 1st ult., in the Company's Hall, Threadneedle Street. In addition to various part-songs, Pattison's "May Day" was admirably performed and met with a hearty reception from a crowded audience. The second part of the programme consisted of solos, both instrumental and vocal, contributed by "old boys." Mr. Edmund Rogers conducted.

Miss Lane gave a very successful Concert, on the 5th ult., in the Vestry Hall, Anerley. She was heard in Schumann's Phantasiestücke (Op. 88) for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte; Grieg's Sonata in C minor for violin and pianoforte, and in several pianoforte solos. The string parts were well played by Herr Friedel and Mr. R. Bucknall, and songs were contributed by Mrs. Helmer and Mr. W. R. Moreton.

On the 30th ult. the Teddington Choral Union performed Bennett's "May Queen" in a very satisfactory manner under the conductorship of Mr. Frank Figg. The principals were Miss Boniwell, Miss Louise Weaver, Mr. Masters, and Mr. Ruffel, who were all equal to the task set before them. The second part of the programme, in which the above-named artists also took part, was miscellaneous.

The new organ in Peterborough Cathedral, together with the reredos erected to the memory of the late Dean Argles, the sanctuary screens, choir gates, &c., were dedicated on the 10th ult. by the Bishop of Peterborough, assisted by the Bishop of Norwich. The organ, which is one of the largest in England, and which cost £4,400, is the gift of an anonymous donor.

The second annual Dinner and Conference of the Northern Members of the Royal College of Organists took place at the Albion Hotel, Manchester, on April 28. Mr. J. F. Slater presided at the Conference and Dr. E. H. Turpin at the Dinner, when nearly forty members were present.

During the past month an interesting series of weekly Organ Recitals has been given on the fine organ in St. Paul's Church, Onslow Square, by Mr. C. E. Jolley, Mr. H. W. Richards, Mr. G. B. Gilbert, and Mr. J. W. Ivimey.

The annual Dinner of the Royal College of Organists took place at the Holborn Restaurant on the 10th ult. Sir John Stainer presided, and, in proposing the toast of the evening, stated that the members now numbered 1,150.

Mr. John Horan has been appointed Organist of Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, in the room of the late Sir Robert P. Stewart.

Mr. Francis Korbay has arrived in London to take up his appointment at the Royal Academy of Music.

OBITUARY.

Another link between past and present has been severed by the death, on the 4th ult., at Birkenhead, of Mr. Edward Gunton, at the age of seventy-six. The deceased was originally destined for a commercial or manufacturing career at Norwich; but early in life he devoted the emoluments accruing from his supererogatory work as an organist in "the city of singers and ringers" to the cost of a thorough musical training, under the guidance of the late Cipriani Potter, at the Royal Academy of Music. In the sixties and seventies he had a large teaching connection at Birkenhead, where he was highly respected. His late brother preceded Dr. J. C. Bridge as Organist of Chester Cathedral.

We regret to have to announce the following deaths:—

Hugh Brooksbank, Mus. Bac., Oxon., on April 28, at Sunnyside, Canton, Cardiff, for twelve years Organist and Choirmaster to Llandaff Cathedral. As a boy he was a chorister at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, under Sir George Elvey, and afterwards studied under Dr. Haydn Keeton, of Peterborough Cathedral.

John Edwards, aged eighty-five, at Barnstaple, where he had lived for sixty years. He had taken a prominent part in musical movements in the district, and was one of the founders of a local Philharmonic Society. He was the father of Mr. Henry J. Edwards, Mus. Doc.

Madame Julia Gaylord, for many years one of the prime donne in the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company. She was an American by birth, and made her début in London in 1875. Mignon, Marguerite, Elsa, and Senta were some of her best parts, the first-named being perhaps her greatest success. She created the chief parts in many of the operas produced by Carl Rosa, and as her fine soprano voice and sympathetic style had won her many friends in England, her premature disappearance from the lyric stage is much regretted. She was married to Mr. F. C. Packard, the American tenor, and was only about forty-two at the time of her death, which took place at Brooklyn.

N. W. Benjamin de Solla, professor of music, on April 28, at 10, St. John the Evangelist Road, Highgate Road, aged seventy-seven.

Joseph Bourne Haydon Dando, in former years a well-known violinist. He was a pupil of Brandi and Mori, and joined the Philharmonic orchestra in 1831. Up to 1875 he occupied a prominent position in all the best London orchestras. He claimed to have been the first to introduce public performances of string quartets in London in 1835. He was eighty-eight.

Leopold Landau, operatic tenor, at Hamburg, on the 9th ult., during a rehearsal of "Rienzi." He was well known in London, as he appeared at the German opera in 1882 and 1892, his Mime in "Siegfried" and David in "Die Meistersinger" being much admired. For seventeen years he had been a member of the Hamburg opera. He was born at Prague in 1841.

Alois Walter, Concertmeister at the Mozarteum, Salzburg, on April 27, aged sixty-two.

Carlo Fassi, conductor, teacher, and composer, at Turin, on April 9, aged fifty-three.

Joseph Dumestre, baritone, for a number of years a valued member of the Paris Grand Opéra. He died at Paris on the 19th ult., aged fifty-eight.

Pietro Abbà-Cornaglia, composer of three fairly successful operas and other works, at Alexandria (Egypt), aged forty-three.

Giuseppe Lamberti, at Turin, aged seventy-four. He wrote several operas, a mass, a cantata, and other works, some of which were very successful in Italy.

Gemma Luziani de Nervi, first-rate pianist and a teacher of her instrument at the National Institute of Music at Rio de Janeiro, in which town she died of yellow fever, on April 19.

M. Berthemes, chef de chant at the Paris Opera Comique, on the 10th ult., at Paris.

T. H. Wright, harpist, on the 21st ult., aged eighty-eight. He was the son-in-law of J. B. Cramer.

The interest in Dr. Bridge's "Musical Gestures" continues to increase. The Gresham Professor has lectured on the subject during the past month at the High School, Wimbledon; the Town Hall, Luton; and the College, Leamington. At the two last-named places the illustrations were given by the boys of the local church choirs, thus showing the practicability of the scheme without the aid of Dr. Bridge's own highly trained choir.

Mr. Willem Coenen gave a Pianoforte Recital in Paris, at the Salons Pleyel Wolff, on April 27, when he was assisted by Mr. Hollman, the eminent violoncellist, and a very interesting programme was presented. The French Press speaks in complimentary terms of Mr. Coenen's performance, stating that "he interprets classical and modern music with rare artistic feeling and that his performance of Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 57) and Liszt's Rhapsody (No. 11) especially merit unstinted praise."

Miss Janie Crompton, of Manchester, has gained the diploma, with honourable mention, of the Royal Music Conservatorium, Dresden. She was pupil of Frau Rappoldi-Kahrer, Court pianist to the King of Saxony. Miss Crompton is only seventeen years of age.

An autograph MS. of one of Bach's Church Cantatas has been presented by Mr. Sedley Taylor to the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge.

THE JUBILEE OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Your January number has reminded the readers of your paper that The Musical Times will soon attain its jubilee. What a memorable period in the history of music in England those fifty years comprise! Looking back, as I can do, over the half-century, and remembering, as I do, the costliness of good music at its commencement, it is delightful to call to mind the great work which Messrs. Novello's house has accomplished in placing the noblest monuments of the great masters in the hands of all orders and degrees of men. To them we owe the greatly enhanced enjoyment of an oratorio which springs from the possession of a portable copy which can be carried easily in the hand and used during the performance. I well remember the publication of the first octavo edition of "The Messiah." It came out in numbers, which were eagerly looked for by the subscribers. The same original copy still stands on my music shelves, somewhat soiled with frequent use.

To them singers in choirs are indebted for the great enjoyment of having not a mere part from which to sing, but a complete vocal score, so that they can understand the work itself and the relation which their part bears to the whole composition—a most important aid to musical education.

As one looks through the volumes of The Musical Times, one is impressed by the conviction that the vast mass of good music which it contains must have had a very appreciable effect upon the popular taste. It has supplanted a large quantity of utter rubbish, and it has led its readers by gradual steps to refuse the poor and unworthy and to choose the good.

I remember five-and-thirty years ago, when I was training a village choral society, how quickly the people began to appreciate the great masters. I was afraid that I was leading them on too fast, and gave them some very light music as a relief; but one of my basses came to me and begged hard to have some more Handel: "It was so fine," he said; and he spoke for the choir as well as for himself. The octavo publications of Messrs. Novello made it possible to comply with their request, and at the same time not to exceed the modest means which were at our disposal.

Messrs. Novello have done a noble work for music in this country, and The Musical Times has played its part in the dissemination of a pure taste. May your success in the future equal, it can hardly exceed, the triumphs of the past.—I am, Sir, &c.,

W. Sparrow Simpson,
Sub.-Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—The Musical Society of Victoria desires to offer to you their hearty congratulations on the occasion of the Jubilee of The Musical Times. The record of events occurring in the art centres of Europe and America, and your excellent criticisms—so free from all ill-nature—are of the greatest interest to all lovers of music, while the more purely literary matter, "From my Study," &c., is always delightful reading. We wish The Times every success, and trust that it may retain for very many years to come the high position which it has so long occupied. Hoping that in the near future you may be able to see your way to appoint a representative for the Australian Colonies,—We remain, Gentlemen, on behalf of the Society, yours faithfully,

George Peake, President.
Thomas J. Hammond, Hon. Sec.

Melbourne, April 4, 1894.

In addition to the above we have received many other letters of congratulation too lengthy to be printed in extenso, but from some of which we have thought it right to print the following quotations :—

Rev. H. A. Walker, formerly of St. Alban's, Holborn.

I remember the old time when there was the barrel organ in the West gallery of the church, and the service was commenced with the singing of "I will arise"; the clerk sat in his box below the clergyman and led the anthem. We did not indulge in many hymn-tunes, as the organ only professed to play a limited number. Then we had Jackson's Te Deum and Jubilate, and with that bill of fare we were made content for many years. I knew no more of church music than that till I went to Harrow, and I am afraid I had not much chance of improvement there. The music of our school chapel was indifferent, nothing being done to improve the music or teach the boys. The music consisted of the chanting of the canticles and two hymns. From Harrow I went to Oxford, and though music was at a low ebb even there, I found great delight in the services at Magdalen and New College. New College, under Dr. Stephen Elvey, was the school for the old English writers of church music; he had a great reverence for Dr. Crotch, and worshipped Handel. Crotch was a link between Handel and Elvey, and Elvey having obtained his inspiration from Crotch had a grand way of interpreting Handel's music, on account of the tempi in which he took the great master's music. But then, what has all this to do with the untold good effected by Novello's, The Musical Times, and cheap editions generally? Much, every way. In those times the music in use by choirs was in MS., and it was, no doubt, on account of the expense of purchasing printed music that so little progress in the art was made. There was an immense collection of services and anthems belonging to the College of the old English school, and to that the choirs confined their attention. If it had not been for Novello enabling choirs to obtain music on such easy terms, music would have been behind in the general advance of modern education. We may have master and organist, but what are they if music of the highest class cannot be placed before learners and at a cost within the reach of all? There is no man who has done a greater practical work for the advance of music in this country than he who makes people to profit by such a divine education. What influence for the good and progress of music must those services, which are now possible in every chapel at Oxford, have upon men who go out thence into all parts, not only of England, but of the world! The cathedrals of England are all vastly improved in their services, from the great fact of having music published at such a price that all can procure it. If the colleges and cathedrals are so improved in their services, we must equally expect to find some change for good in parish church services; and so we thankfully find. Mr. Alfred Novello and his successors have made the music of the Church their work, and to them the Church, as a body, is indebted; and what greater praise can be said than that the whole Church is benefited by this work?

Dr. C. Hubert Parry.

I hear this is the Jubilee year of the foundation of The Musical Times, and that it is to be signalized in some sort next month by a very justifiable pæan over the great work the firm of Novello has achieved during the period since its foundation, in the direction of popularising first-rate music and diffusing it in a cheap form. You have most substantial reason to be proud of the retrospect. When we think of the costly and cumbrous volumes in which alone the great oratorios and operas were attainable half-a-century ago, and how difficult it was for people of moderate income and house room other than spacious to possess many great treasures of our art, we ought to bless the firm which enables even comparatively poor people to enjoy familiarity with the things that are better loved the better they are known; and to have, as it were, always at hand in their own possession, the works which are capable of affording the highest pleasure a man can receive from his art. It is difficult to realise, without looking at a Novello catalogue, how great are the advantages of the musician of the present day, and it must be said that it is no small consideration that, though the works are so cheap, the excellence of printing and paper and editing makes them so eminently presentable and trustworthy. Long may these honourable traditions continue and thrive!

Rev. G. T. Rider, Art and Literary Editor of the "Living Church," Chicago.

Among the many excellent and admirable services The Musical Times has rendered to the cause of ecclesiastical and other high forms of classic art, those which my own country and countrymen have enjoyed are by no means the least considerable. Half-a-century ago the Church was a feeble, halting body, barely holding its own under the concentric animosities of the leading sectarians. Here and there scraps of services with a few chants and tunes would be brought back from England by an occasional voyager who cared for these things. As for anthems and services, there were literally none of native growth; and until Novello's brave and happily successful experiment of providing, at stated intervals, and at a nominal cost, the very best of those Anglican compositions, the liturgic worship of the American church continued in the most deplorable condition. Subsequent developments represent, therefore, the transplanting of Anglican compositions, and for all this we are chiefly, if not altogether, indebted to your own far-seeing and generous enterprise.

Sir John Stainer.

When I was made a small chorister of St. Paul's, The Musical Times was three years old. I well remember the interest which we boys took in each successive number, how we discussed the news, and especially, how we criticised the music issued with it. At that time I thought that a man must indeed be a "great man" if his compositions appeared in The Musical Times, and I recall a passing thought that could I only some day appear as a composer of an anthem in The Musical Times, no higher pinnacle of fame could be attainable. At that time parish churches were only just beginning to awake to the fact that a simple choral service was within the range of possibility. Simultaneously with this ecclesiastical growth, choral societies began to spring up, all of which set to work modestly on part-songs and glees. The influence of The Musical Times in giving cheap music, in spreading information, in encouraging efforts, must be accepted as a historical fact, of which Novello and Co. are indeed justified in being proud, and for which all musicians ought to express deep gratitude.

Mr. Alfred R. Gaul.

Having heard that The Musical Times attains its jubilee during the month of June, I desire to offer my warmest congratulations. As you, Mr. Editor, will most likely be putting before your readers a sketch of the results of fifty years work in the cause of music, I will not trouble you with more than the following little fact:—Some forty or more years ago, when I was a Cathedral boy of about twelve years of age, I remember the delight it was to me to be able to purchase the oratorios in 6d. divisions; and anthems which I had only known in such ponderous volumes as Boyce's Collection, for 1½d. each, thanks to Messrs. Novello and Co. having originated cheap octavo editions. It is not speaking at all too strongly to say that the liberal enterprise of Messrs. Novello and Co., as publishers, has done more for the advancement of high-class choral and church music than that of any other, or indeed all other, firms in the world. Trusting the firm may in the future help on the cause of music with as much success as in the past.

Professor J. F. Bridge.

May I add my voice to those who wish continued success to The Musical Times and its publishers? Well do I remember the pride with which I saw my first published part-song in its pages a good many years ago, a fact full of encouragement to a young and unknown musician. I know that this same encouragement has been often extended to many who might otherwise have remained unknown and unsung. The influence of the work of Novello and Co. on the progress of music, by the issue of their most complete list of works, new and old, at cheap prices, cannot, I am sure, be over-estimated. The best wishes of all who are interested in the art are surely due to the firm, which is really one of the musical institutions of the country.

Sir Walter Parratt.

You have my hearty congratulations on the Jubilee you celebrate next month. If the English are a more musical nation than they were fifty years ago, and I believe this to be the case, there can be no doubt that the enterprise, foresight, and public spirit of the house of Novello have largely contributed to this result. The Musical Times, by its ready appreciation of everything that was good, and its careful avoidance of the small squabbles to which the emotional musician is somewhat prone, has well deserved its long and vigorous life, and I can only wish for it another half-century of beneficial influence.

Dr. A. C. Mackenzie.

Let me haste to make merry with you on this festive occasion. The many pages of your volumes not only chronicle the progress of music in England, but show clearly how great has been the influence you have exercised, as well as the most active share which you have persistently taken in a cause which continually calls for further assistance not only from you, but also from those men (yclept composers) who have had the privilege of joining you loyally in the noble work.

Sir Joseph Barnby.

It would be impossible for me—who have known so much of the influence which the firm of Novello & Co. has had upon the progress of music during the past half-century—to let so interesting an occasion pass without wishing God-speed to The Musical Times, and to the house which has had more effect upon the progress of music in this country than any—I might almost say—Institution in the land.

Dr. Hiles, Manchester.

Of the influence of The Musical Times and of the work the house of Novello has done by bringing vast quantities of choral music within easy reach, I think it would be difficult to over-estimate the gain, especially to those small societies of real lovers (amateurs) desiring to increase their knowledge of the art and its treasures.

Sir George Grove, C.B.

I congratulate you on The Musical Times having reached its fiftieth year. It is an excellent magazine, not only in respect of its general scheme, but for the welcome it gives the early works of many a young composer, which otherwise would probably never see the light.

THE BRISTOL ORPHEUS SOCIETY.

To the Editor of "The Musical Times."

Sir,—I am glad that in your notice of the excellent Concert given by the Bristol Orpheus Society last April you call attention to the apathy of Londoners in respect to unaccompanied part-singing.

That many and various difficulties do exist in the production and performance of this class of music no one can deny, but notwithstanding these difficulties I ask your readers if nothing can be done to alter this state of things. Is it impossible to establish and support a Society in London having for its primary object the study and performance of unaccompanied motets, madrigals, part-songs, glees, &c.? I think I am right in saying that no public society now exists in the Metropolis which performs that class of music. Several private and semi-private associations meet for practice and give private and semi-private performances. These societies no doubt do good work, but their Concerts are not for the general public. That meritorious Society, the Bach Choir, devotes one of its Concerts to unaccompanied music; and I am glad to note that each year that Concert is being better attended. These rare opportunities of enjoyment and instruction in that particular branch of music, however, cannot go far to foster, develop, and educate the latent taste for it, which possibly is dormant in many musical minds. Much of the indifference shown, I believe, proceeds from a pardonable want of knowledge of the unsurpassed beauty of melody, and skilfulness of workmanship of many of these compositions, both ancient and modern. I venture to think that in this case the supply would, after a time of education, create the demand. At another time I may make a few suggestions for the establishment and support of such a society; and if these remarks should provoke further correspondence, or appear to awaken any interest in the subject, I may continue them, if acceptable, in a future letter. I shall only add that I think a choir, it started, should comprise sopranos, altos, counter-tenors, tenors, and basses, with enough of counter-tenors to make it possible to vary the programmes of the Concerts with compositions for male voices alone.—I am, Sir, &c.

A Lover of the Neglected Madrigal.

THE OLDER MUSICAL SOCIETIES.

To the Editor of "The Musical Times."

Sir,—In your number for this month, under the heading of "Correspondence," I find a letter signed "John Galt, Exeter, April 23, 1894," asking if any of the readers of your valuable Magazine would kindly inform him of the date of establishment of the older and yet existing "musical societies"; so I beg as an old member of the "Bradford Old Choral Society," and of which I have had now the honour and pleasure of being the "President" for some years, to inform your correspondent that our "Society" was established in the year 1821, and has never ceased to exist and carry on its rehearsals and concerts since. Of course, like other similar bodies, it has had a varied kind of experience, and especially at the period of 1856, when many of its members left it to join our Bradford Choral Society, which was formed mainly from its members; but it has now a chorus of about 300 good Yorkshire voices, mostly very young and enthusiastic members, and a band of sixty, and holds its rehearsals every week. It has a very brilliant future before it, and is prepared to submit to any amount of hard work and study to achieve success. Hoping this will interest your correspondent and readers in general,—I beg to remain, Sir, yours respectfully,

R. Leach,
President of B.O.C.S.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

H. E. Earle.—Mr. Francesco Berger, the well-known composer and teacher, is not the author of the novel "Charles Auchester." The English translation of Weber's "Abu Hassan" was made specially for the Royal College of Music; for further information on this subject you had better apply to Sir George Grove. Dr. Boyce's Serenata "Solomon" is quite out of print, but a second-hand copy has recently been advertised in a bookseller's catalogue, price 18s.; the Air and Chorus, "Softly rise, O, southern breeze," from this cantata, is still to be had, price 3d.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Armagh, Ireland.—Mr. E. L. Fischer's incidental music to the first two scenes of Goethe's "Faust" was performed, for the first time, on the 14th ult., and was very well received by a large audience. The music consists of four choruses, a duet for two sopranos with harp accompaniment, and a tenor solo. A characteristic Leitmotiv opens and concludes the work.

ASHBURNE, DERBYSHIRE.—The Manfield Church Choir gave, on the 9th ult., an admirable miscellaneous Concert, under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Tutt. The programme included Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, and several well chosen choruses and part-songs. The vocalists were Miss Watkin, Miss Bond, Miss Fairbrother, Miss Alcock, the Misses Ethel and Cecilia Tutt, and Messrs. Allen, Bridge, Tutt, Grimshaw, and H. Simpson. Miss M. Tutt played the pianoforte part of Mendelssohn's "Rondo Brillant," in which she was ably assisted by the orchestra, and Mr. J. G. Grimshaw contributed a violin solo.——On the 17th ult. the Choral Society gave a performance of Handel's "Samson," in which the vocal solo parts were entrusted to Miss R. Long, Miss F. Bourne, Mr. R. L. James, and Mr. H. J. England. Mr. J. G. Grimshaw led an efficient orchestra, Mr. R. A. Darwall was the Organist, and Mr. W. H. Tutt conducted.

BASINGSTOKE.—The second Concert of the Choral Society took place on April 24 in the Drill Hall, when "Elijah" was performed by a chorus and orchestra of 140 performers. Miss Blanche Powell, Miss Edith Hands, Mr. Harry Stubbs, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint were the solo vocalists; Mr. Charles Griffiths led the orchestra, Mr. Frank Idle rendered valuable assistance at the harmonium, and Mr. H. E. Powell conducted.

BASSALEG.—The new organ, the gift of Lord Tredegar, recently erected in the church by Messrs. Vowles of Bristol, was opened on April 26 by a dedicatory service, which was largely attended. The capabilities of the organ were, during the ceremonial, advantageously displayed by Mr. E. W. Perren, the Organist, and by his able pupil, Mr. C. A. Mills. The anthem was Dr. C. D. Bell's festive Ode, set to music by Berthold Tours, the effective solo in which was well sung by Miss Morgan. Assistance was also given by about twenty members of the Newport Orchestral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. E. G. R. Richards. After the service, Lord Tredegar presented Mr. Perren with a silver tea service and an illuminated testimonial, signed by sixty members of the choir and congregation, in token of their appreciation of his services during the past twenty-five years.

BEDFORD.—The Musical Society gave its 112th subscription Concert on the 8th ult., in the Corn Exchange. The programme included Hamish MacCunn's ballad "Lord Ullin's Daughter" and the first performance of a graceful choral work, entitled "Early Spring," by the Rev. V. W. Popham. Madame Clara Samuell's singing was greatly appreciated, and songs were also contributed by Mr. J. Layland. Mr. H. R. Rose's and Mr. E. Woolhouse's pianoforte and violoncello playing were much admired, and the orchestral playing reflected credit on Mr. Diemer, the Conductor of the Society, who, however, would do well to avoid such unjustifiable orchestral arrangements as Chopin's Pianoforte Polonaise in A flat.

CAPE TOWN.—A very fine rendering of Bach's "Passion" music was given in the Cathedral on March 20. The choir, numbering sixty voices (men and boys), gave evidence of careful and painstaking rehearsal. The soloists were Mrs. Edward Mills, Mrs. Griffith Vincent, Messrs. E. Lane, C. H. Cawse, and F. C. Löwinger. The Oratorio was produced under the direction of Mr. T. Barrow Dowling. This was the first performance of the "Passion" music in South Africa.

CHESTER.—Mr. A. F. Thornborough provided an excellent Concert for his numerous patrons on April 24, in the Music Hall. The Meister Glee Singers made their first appearance here, and with their usual success. Mr. Thornborough's own finished singing was greatly appreciated, and Herr Ter Poorten's violoncello solos much enjoyed. Songs were also contributed by Miss Fanny de Boufflers, and Miss Marie Raynor recited.

CHICHESTER.—The Musical Society gave its thirty-second Concert to subscribers and friends on April 26. The programme consisted of selections from Weber's works, including "Oberon," "Der Freischütz," and "Preciosa." Miss Jessie Scott (soprano) and Mr. Clifford Hunnybun (tenor) were the vocalists; Mr. P. A. Whitehead presided at the pianoforte, Mr. W. A. Taylor at the harmonium, and Dr. F. J. Read conducted.

CHIGWELL.—A lengthy selection from "Elijah" was given in the Parish Church on the 17th ult., by an augmented choir. The soloists were Miss Adele Külm, Miss Shakspeare Smith, Mr. Herbert Clinch, Mr. H. F. Chamen, and Master Herbert Clinch. A well balanced orchestra, numbering twenty players, and led by Mr. W. B. Carter, accompanied with skill. Mr. Henry Riding conducted; and, during the Offertory, played Handel's Second Organ Concerto, Mr. E. C. Nunn acting as Conductor.

COLWYN BAY.—On the 15th ult. Mr. T. J. Linekar played an attractive selection of arrangements for the organ in St. John's Wesleyan Church.

ENNISCORTHY, IRELAND.—The Choral Union gave its second Concert, under the Conductorship of Mr. F. Hatson Wright, on April 26, in the Church Institute. The choir rendered an effective selection of part-songs, and violin and zither solos were respectively played by Mr. G. A. Thornton and Mr. W. Mills; the last-named gentleman also contributing several recitations.

FENNY STRATFORD.—The Musical Society gave two excellent performances of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" on the 8th and 9th ult. The solos were taken by Miss Downes, Miss Florence Bourne, Mr. F. Hamlyn-Crimp, and the Rev. C. T. Blundell. Mr. T. J. Henley led the orchestra, Mr. W. E. Kirby presided at the organ, and Captain W. J. Levi ably conducted.

GRAVESEND.—The choir of Princes' Street Congregational Church celebrated its annual Festival on the 9th ult., when the cantata "Christian Pilgrim," by J. E. Newell, was successfully performed by a choir of seventy voices, aided by an orchestra and organ. The Misses Smith and Hendry and Messrs. Maplesden and Walker were the soloists. Mr. T. L. Winnett was the Organist, and Mr. W. Phillips conducted.

GUILDFORD.—The first public performance of the newly formed Ladies' Amateur Orchestra took place on the 17th ult. in the St. Nicolas Parish Hall. The programme included Handel's "Occasional" Overture, Purcell's "Dreistücke" for strings, and a Minuet and Trio by Schubert also for strings, all of which were rendered with admirable steadiness and precision. Mrs. Clayton and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint were the vocalists, Miss Amy Crommelin played two violin pieces, and Mr. P. Daws, the Conductor of the Society, contributed a violoncello solo.

KINGSTON.—Miss Norah Boyle, a young local violinist, gave her fourth evening Concert of the season at the Albany Hall, on the 2nd ult., when she played during the evening the following pieces: "Preghiera" (Bazzini), "The Bird on the tree" (Hauser); and was joined by her sister in two duets for pianoforte and violin, "Masaniello" (Auber) and "The Poet and Peasant" (Suppé). Miss Boyle was assisted by Miss Gladwin, Miss Louise Weaver (who sang Behrend's new song "The mission of the wind" very successfully), Mr. Gilbert Thorne, and Mr. Arthur Kestin, who contributed two recitations.

LANCASTER.—A Concert of high class character was given on April 24 in the Storey Institute. The programme contained a most artistic selection of part-songs for ladies' voices, by Cherubini, Brahms, and Rubinstein, which were admirably rendered by Fräulein Wichern's choir, and an excellent series of vocal solos sung by Miss Agatha Birch, Madame Maud Yates, the Rev. R. L. Atkinson, and Mr. C. B. C. Storey. Mrs. Clarke, Miss Whelon, and Miss Willis lent able assistance in several vocal trios, and instrumental support was efficiently rendered by Messrs. Paersch, Preatoni, Cockerill, and J. Slater; the last-named gentleman sharing the duties of accompanist with Fräulein Wichern.

LOWESTOFT.—The Choral Society gave the second Concert of its present season in the Rink Theatre, on the 8th ult., when the chief work performed was Gade's ballad "The Erl-King's Daughter." The vocalists engaged were Miss Laura Hocking, Miss Evelyn Ray, Mr. Sadleur Brown, and Mr. J. B. Smith. Miss Emuss and Mr. R. J. Pitcher played pianoforte solos with great brilliancy. Mr. Matt Clarke led a small orchestra, and valuable assistance was rendered at the pianoforte and harmonium by Mr. R. J. Pitcher and Mr. P. H. Chignell.

Maidstone.—The first of a proposed series of annual Musical Competitions, arranged by Dr. Henniker and Mr. S. Grant, took place on the 8th ult. in the Town Hall. In the competition for choral societies the first prize was won by the Folkestone Choir, conducted by Mr. F. E. Fletcher; the second by the Tonbridge Wesleyan Choir, conducted by Mr. G. J. Kimmins; and the third was divided between the Cranbrook and Sutton Valence Schools. The prize for village choirs was awarded to the Teston Church Choir. The successful quartet singers were the Misses W. and H. and Messrs. V. and E. Dungey; Miss Hubble gained the prize for solo singing, and that for pianoforte playing was divided between Miss Hopkins and Miss M. Day; the prize for the best violin performance being similarly divided between Miss Tomkin and Miss H. B. Payne. Dr. Longhurst was the adjudicator in place of Sir Herbert Oakeley, from whom a long and interesting letter was read. The prizes were presented by Mrs. Wykeham-Martin, and addresses were given by the Mayor and Dr. Henniker, who said the scheme so successfully carried out had been originated by The Key Note.

Morecambe.—The fourth annual musical Competition took place on April 28, when the adjudicator was Dr. J. C. Bridge. The proceedings were carried out in a most satisfactory manner under the able direction of Mr. J. W. Aldous, and prizes for church choir, sight, and part-singing were awarded to Tunstal public elementary school; Over-Kellet church choir, conducted by Mr. R. T. Grossè; Morecambe female voice choir, conducted by Mr. R. G. W. Hawson; Hornby choir; Mr. Whittaker's sight-reading class from Blackpool; Kirkby Lonsdale class; Morecambe Madrigal Society, conducted by Mr. R. G. W. Howson; the Reedyford Wesleyan choir; and the Leeds Blenheim choir. The first prize for sight reading for competitors under sixteen was won by Master Marcus Webster, a little fellow of seven years; his elder brother, Harold, and Miss Ethel Taylor sharing the second prize; and the winners of the prizes in a similar competition for candidates over sixteen were Mr. H. Whittaker and Mr. E. Illidge. Miss Wakefield presented the prizes, and in the evening an interesting Concert was given by the successful competitors, at which Madame Clara Samuell sang.

Newcastle.—The annual Concert of the Clayton Orchestral Society took place in the Central Hall on April 26, when the programme included Haydn's Symphony in B flat, and the vocalists were Miss M. Surtees, Miss A. Moffitt, and Mr. W. C. Kirton. Violin and violoncello solos were contributed by Miss F. Davis and Mr. C. Jeavens, and Haydn's "Gipsy" Rondo was played in an effective manner by the Misses Ethel and Lena Henderson and Mr. G. Dodds, jun. Mr. George Dodds conducted.

New Wortley.—An Organ Recital was given by Miss Ashley in the Parish Church on the 19th ult., when an interesting programme, comprising works by Bach, Mozart, Marchetti, Gounod, and others was effectively played. The vocalist was Mr. Gordon Heller.

Ore, Sussex.—The Choral Society, conducted by Mr. J. F. Hindell, gave, on the 16th ult., an effective performance, with orchestral accompaniment, of Cowen's melodious cantata "The Rose Maiden," the solos being taken by Miss F. Lenton, Miss L. Verrall, Mr. H. F. Lott, and Mr. C. N. Newman. In the miscellaneous second part Mr. M. Clarke played De Beriot's violin solo "Scène de Ballet."

Packington.—Mr. Taylor played an effective selection of organ pieces, including Mendelssohn's Sonata in D, at the dedication of the new organ recently erected in the Parish Church.

Radcliffe-on-Trent.—Mr. G. H. Fox gave, on the 13th ult., an attractive Recital on the new organ recently erected in the Parish Church. Several solos were effectively sung by members of the church choir and other vocalists.

Reading.—The Orpheus Society produced, on the 8th ult., in the Town Hall, a new ballad for men's voices entitled "Delphi," a legend of Hellas, by the Rev. John H. Mee, who has most effectively illustrated his text, which consists of selections from a poem by the late Professor Freeman. The tenor solo was admirably sung by Mr. J. C. Allen, and the rendering of the dramatic choruses reflected great credit on the Society. The programme also contained several songs sung by Madame Ada Patterson, violin solos by Mr. R. Gompertz, and an excellent selection of glees and part-songs. Mr. H. P. Allen presided at the pianoforte, Mr. A. W. Moss was the Organist, and Mr. F. J. Read conducted the glees and part-songs.

Rugby.—The Philharmonic Society gave a very successful performance of the "Golden Legend" in the New Big School on the 10th ult., under the direction of Mr. Basil Johnson. The orchestra was augmented by about a dozen members of Mr. Stockley's band, and Mr. G. H. Hidden presided at the organ. The soloists were Miss Jessie Scott, Mrs. Lee, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. John Sandbrook. The chorus consisted of about a hundred members.

Sheffield.—The Amateur Musical Society performed Randegger's cantata "Fridolin" in the Albert Hall on the 4th ult., under the direction of Mr. Schollhammer. The Spring Concert of the above Society usually marks the close of the musical season in Sheffield, and this year the Concert under notice has terminated an unusually lengthy list of musical fixtures. The high reputation of the Society's chorus-singing was fully maintained, and the principals rendered the somewhat exacting music in admirable style. Eaton Faning's dramatic scene "Liberty," a part-song, "The Bells of St. Michael's Tower," and miscellaneous pieces completed the programme. The Pitsmoor Musical Society performed Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" on April 30, with conspicuous success. Mr. J. W. Renshaw, the Conductor of the Society, has considerably improved the chorus-singing, and a prosperous future should follow his efforts. An excellent orchestra, led by Mr. J. H. Parkes, contributed largely to the success of the Concert.——The last of a series of successful Concerts was given in the Sheffield Press Club on the 26th ult., when Mr. Frederic Dawson gave a Pianoforte Recital. The programme included pieces by Chopin, Schumann, Moszkowski, and Liszt.

Stratford.—Bennett's cantata "The May Queen" and a miscellaneous selection were performed, on the 10th ult., in the Town Hall, by the Forest Gate Vocal Union and Orchestral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Bonner. The artists engaged were Madame C. Fuller, Miss Shakespeare Smith, Mr. J. H. Mullerhausen, and Mr. L. Glasspoole. Miss Lena Fuller played violin solos by Schumann and Papini. Mr. J. F. Proudman was the Organist, and valuable assistance was given in the accompaniments by the Misses L. Gould, R. Moxley, L. Smith, and Fuller.

Sydney, Australia.—Prior to her departure for London, Miss Ada Crossley gave, on March 14, a farewell Concert in the Town Hall. The favourite contralto was in her best voice, and gave abundant justification for the admiration and esteem which her singing has called forth. She was ably assisted by Miss Lilian Tree, Mr. Frank Adams, Mr. Hallewell, Mr. H. T. Gordon, Mr. H. Staell, Mr. M. H. Kawalski, and the members of the Liedertafel, conducted by Mr. J. A. Delany. During the performance Miss Crossley was presented by the Mayor with an illuminated address, wishing her a successful début in England.——The Philharmonic Society opened its new season in the Town Hall on March 21, with an excellent performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus." The ensemble reflected great credit on the Conductor, Mr. Hazon; and the soloists engaged were Madame K. Haines, Miss N. Young, Mr. C. Saunders, Mr. P. Bates, and Mr. Hallewell. Mr. Allpress led the orchestra, and M. Wiegand presided with his usual skill at the monster organ.

Wem.—Mr. Prendergast, Organist of the Parish Church, gave his annual Concert on April 25, when he was assisted by the Choral Society. The chief feature of the evening was the performance of Schubert's "Song of Miriam," but in addition to this several glees, songs, and instrumental pieces were admirably rendered. Miss L. Cestria sang the solos throughout in a most efficient manner, and the whole performance reflected the greatest credit on the Conductor and the members of the Society.

WIMBLEDON.—Mr. Albon Nash's miscellaneous Concert, on April 25, in the St. George's Hall, attracted a large audience, who gave frequent testimony of their appreciation of Mr. Nash's singing, and also that of Madame Edwardes, Miss Annie Layton, Mr. F. Millward, and Mr. A. J. Layton. Harp and cornet solos, respectively played by Miss A. Brousson and Miss B. Pettit, and recitations by Mr. W. Churcher completed the programme. Mr. W. Tear was an efficient accompanist.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. J. Walter Fry, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Yardley.—Mr. C. Hugh Rowcliffe, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Michael's, London Fields.—Mr. G. Herbert Johnson, Organist and Choirmaster to Wesleyan Chapel, Prestwich, Manchester.—Mr. Mervyn Dene, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mary Magdalene's, Paddington.—Mr. Herbert Gresham, to the Parish Church, Limehouse.—Mr. W. Berridge Hicks, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Oswald's Church, Small Heath, Birmingham.

WRIST and FINGER GYMNASTICS. For STUDENTS of the PIANOFORTE, VIOLIN, ORGAN, and other instruments. By A. LEFFLER ARNIM, Author of "Health Maps," &c. Twenty minutes' daily practice of these exercises will reduce by two-thirds the usual necessary hours of mechanical practice. In addition to which the passive exercises assist in the cultivation of a refined and delicate touch. Sir Charles Hallé says: ". . . I have no hesitation in saying that I think it most exhaustive and useful." Mr. Arthur O'Leary says: ". . . I am confident the exercises you recommend are likely to have the best results." Signor Papini says: ". . . Invaluable to anyone studying the violin or any other instrument requiring flexibility of the fingers." "Although, as our readers must know, we are decidedly opposed to mechanical appliances for the fingers of pianoforte students, the same objection does not apply to 'Wrist and Finger Gymnastics.'"—Musical Times. "Most useful and well calculated to produce that suppleness of wrist and elasticity of touch without which no good results can ever be obtained on the piano. The author clearly understands what she is writing about."—Musical Standard.

RUTH

SUITABLE FOR USE IN PLACES OF WORSHIP

EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

SUITABLE FOR

THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy reapers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventful episode lends itself to a pathetic, picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved and sorrowful trio of women on whom the calamity of poverty and famine has fallen, as if to give intensity to their greater grief, and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal benevolence displayed by the mighty Boaz, who so quickly transforms sorrow into joy, are all introduced and aptly take their allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Citizen.

"The work, like the 'Holy City,' is full of beautiful orchestral passages, while the vocal score abounds with charming numbers."—Bucks Herald.

"'Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. . . . The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject."—Bradford Observer.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"'Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. . . . It contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

A JUVENILE OPERETTA IN ONE ACT

FOR UNISON SINGING

VERSE BY

MAUD BALDWICK

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Mr. Gaul has followed up his beautiful Cantata 'Una' with a composition which, while full of charm, is in no wise to be compared with his more ambitious efforts. 'The Legend of the Wood' is a juvenile operetta in one act, the words—very pretty in their simplicity—being by Miss Maud Baldwick. We recorded the fact that the operetta was performed a few days ago, and we have very little doubt of its speedily becoming a popular favourite at schools. Mr. Gaul's music is very tuneful, and he has provided some taking and effective melodies for the vocalists, and for the chorus of 'mortals' and 'fairies.' One of the most graceful pieces is the chorus and dance, 'Now we fairies in a ring,' tempo di valse; though it is a somewhat difficult task to single out parts for special commendation where the merit is so even throughout. Mr. Gaul and Miss Baldwick are certainly to be congratulated upon this attractive trifle, in which evidence is provided of much skill expended upon a small affair. Simple as the music is it is always scholarly, and the verses are far above the average."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

AT

BY

C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

The attention which has of late years been given by our Universities to the cultivation of music, and the endeavour to again make the degrees of Doctor and Bachelor in that faculty of substantial value, as marks of real musical erudition and culture on the part of the holder, as was formerly the case, have induced me to try and investigate the early history of these degrees which are peculiar to the English Universities, and are practically unknown abroad.

I have traced the course of the degrees from the earliest time they are mentioned to the present day, when the tendency becomes more and more marked to place music on a level in every respect with the other faculties.

FOURTH EDITION.

KING ARTHUR

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

FOR

THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

JAMES SMIETON, M.A.

MUSIC BY

JOHN MORE SMIETON.

OLD NOTATION, 2s. 6d.; TONIC SOL-FA, 1s.

Full Score and Band Parts on hire. String Parts for sale at 16s.

The attention of Conductors is specially directed to the above Cantata, as affording an unusually interesting work for Chorus and Soloists. It takes about an hour and forty minutes to perform, and has been given with conspicuous success by the Choral Unions of Dundee, Broughty Ferry, Airdrie, Peebles, Helensburgh, and Hamilton, as well as performances by Miss Holland's Choir (2), Byfield (2), Uckfield, Wakefield, Brondesbury, Glasgow Academy Choir, Glasgow E. Choral Society, Newcastle, Montrose, Stirling, Ayr, Kineton, Arbroath, Selhurst, Chichester, Reading, &c., Choral Societies.

SCOTSMAN.

This beautiful work will enhance the reputation won for its composer by his similar composition, "Ariadne." It shows a charming gift of melody and no small musicianly skill in its merely technical qualities. It may be recommended to Choral Societies as well worthy of study.

MUSICAL TIMES (June 1, 1892).

Mr. John More Smieton's dramatic Cantata "King Arthur" was the pièce de resistance at the annual concert by the Glasgow Academy Choir on April 29. A better choice could hardly have been made, inasmuch as the work has been laid out on lines which cannot fail to prove popular amongst the numerous choral societies ever on the alert for novelty. Mr. James Smieton's admirably written libretto has, indeed, afforded opportunity for effective musical treatment, which is not only graceful and melodious, but eminently graphic in its descriptive power, the work, in short, of a craftsman who is steadily making progress amongst contemporary composers.

DUNDEE EVENING TELEGRAPH (March 30, 1892).

"King Arthur" is called by the composer a cantata, but the name hardly conveys to the mind an idea of the elaborate, lengthy, and powerful character of the work. It is rather a musical epic, and is characterised throughout by a scholarly knowledge of harmony, by a variety and richness of effect, and notably by a melodiousness throughout that are really remarkable. One notable feature which must be mentioned is the effective character of Mr. Smieton's recitatives. The beautiful hymn "There is a land" was a much relished item near the close of the cantata, which ended with a powerful chorus, in which the composer calls up all the resources before him to make a telling and impressive finish to the work.

GLASGOW HERALD (November 30, 1892).

The Eastern Choral Sociey gave a concert last night in the City Hall. The work chosen for performance was Mr. John More Smieton's "King Arthur." Mr. Smieton has set music to his brother's libretto with very happy results, and the work contains many delightful choruses and solos. Miss Annie Lea was the soprano soloist, impersonating Guinevere; Mr. Probert, the tenor (Arthur); Mr. J. W. Render took the music allotted to Merlin and Sir Bedevere. Mr. Cole's orchestra furnished an excellent accompaniment. . . . The choir consisted of about 150 voices, and Mr. George Taggart, the conductor, may be congratulated on having trained them to a high state of efficiency.

THE MUSICAL EXCHANGE, 16, George Street,

Hanover Square, W.

TO BE OPENED EARLY IN JULY.

*President:
Lady President: Madame ANTOINETTE STERLING.
Vice-Presidents: Mr. FREDERIC H. COWEN, Mr. N. VERT, Mr. ROBERT COCKS, Mr. WILHELM GANZ, Mr. BEN DAVIES, Mr. EDWIN HOLLAND, Miss HILDA WILSON, &c.
(* The name of the President and a further list of Vice-Presidents will be shortly announced.)
General Manager: Mr. PERCY NOTCUTT.
Secretary: Mr. LIONEL YOUNG.

It is freely acknowledged throughout the musical profession that there is a great want felt by all classes of musicians, in common with all those whose business lies directly or indirectly with them—namely, a general place of meeting, where business can be transacted, appointments made, and where all can meet on an equal footing. We have both musical agents and musical clubs, but it is the object of the MUSICAL EXCHANGE not only to provide a place where artists can transact their business, and communicate quickly with each other or with all the leading agents and publishing houses, but also a place of social resort, where ladies as well as gentlemen can have the convenience of a club. In other words, the MUSICAL EXCHANGE will transact musical business and will be a CLUB into the bargain.

MUSICAL AMATEURS and those desiring to enter the profession are eligible for membership, and will receive experienced and disinterested advice.

LADIES.—One of the principal features of the Exchange will be the admittance of lady members. Up to now there has been no place where ladies could write letters, rest, or transact business. There will be private ladies' drawing-rooms, &c.

A printed list of the leading artists and musicians already enrolled as members can be obtained on application.

The MUSICAL EXCHANGE is so constituted that there is no liability to Members beyond their Subscriptions.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Owing to the very large number of applications already received, and to prevent disappointment, there will be No ENTRANCE FEE to the first 500—instead of 300—members. Early application is requested, when full particulars will be sent post-free.

PERCY NOTCUTT,
General Manager.

MISS

FANNY DE BOUFFLERS

(SOPRANO)

For Oratorios, Cantatas, Concerts, Operatic Recitals, &c.

"THE SCOTTISH ORCHESTRA" (Mr. Georg Henschel, Conductor).—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers contributed much to the enjoyment of the audience. She refused an encore (thrice recalled) for a rendering of the Handelian Air 'Let the bright Seraphim,' but on again being enthusiastically recalled after singing "Should he upbraid," repeated a portion of it."—Glasgow Mail.

"Miss Fanny de Boufflers sang 'Should he upbraid' with a piquancy and brightness which suited the number admirably. The audience was thoroughly pleased, and insisted on a repetition, to which the artiste was finally persuaded."—Glasgow Herald.

CHERUBINI'S "O FONS AMORIS."—"A most excellent rendering was given of Cherubini's 'O fons amoris.' The very exacting solo (ranging from C to C in Alt) was splendidly executed by Miss Fanny de Boufflers, whose extensive compass and fine method were therein displayed to the greatest advantage. This work is one of the composer's six greater Motets. The intrinsic difficulty of the solo soprano part, requiring the extraordinary range of two whole octaves, renders the performance of the work a great rarity."—Liverpool Daily Post.

ROSSINI'S "STABAT MATER."—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers' interpretation of the 'Inflammatus' was at once prayerful and most artistic, and well worthy of her high reputation as an exponent of sacred music."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"ELIJAH" (Cambrian Choral Society).—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers sang the heavy work which is allotted to the Soprano with sympathy, fervour, and dramatic fire throughout."—Birkenhead Advertiser.

"A pure soprano, extensive compass, and fine method."—Liverpool Daily Post.

"A soprano of very considerable worth, receiving a most emphatic demonstration of appreciation from her hearers."—Glasgow Herald.

"Powerful and clear soprano voice."—Northern Daily Telegraph.

"Whose vocalisation was artistic and refined."—Western Daily Press, Bristol.

"Powerful soprano, considerable natural talent."—Manchester Guardian.

"Possesses a bright, pure soprano voice."—Walsall Observer.

"An artiste of decided abilities."—Waterford Star.

"Remarkably sweet and powerful soprano."—Cork Herald.

"Has a well-trained, pure and beautiful voice."—Harrogate Advertiser.

"Was a great success, received with unbounded applause."—Dublin Evening Telegraph.

EXPLOSIVE OPERA.

THERE are few aspects of musical performances in which the development of the resources of the modern orchestra has brought about a greater change than that of dynamics. Nothing is of more frequent occurrence in musical criticism than allusions to sonority, volume of sound, or a conductor's control of dynamic gradations of tone. No doubt the effectiveness of music's appeal to the emotions is enhanced by this greater range of dynamic variety which is at the command of the modern composer, though there is considerable danger of its abuse even though a writer confines himself to the employment of none but strictly musical means. As Dr. Parry points out in his "Art of Music," climaxes of sound are often piled up in modern opera one after another without doing more than merely exciting the animal side of man's nature. And it was doubtless this truculent aspect of modern music that induced a famous professor of the bel canto to exclaim on hearing one of these works, "Chè bruta musica!" It is to be feared, however, to judge from the new departure which has been recently taken, that we are a long way from hearing the last word that modern music has to say in regard to dynamics. A new opera has just been produced at Covent Garden in which the composer has, to an extent never before attempted on the stage, adopted the device of reinforcing the sonority of the orchestra by non-musical sounds. In "La Navarraise" we have a story that is at once sombre, sensational, and realistic. The scenic effects are contrived with remarkable skill so as to bring home with the most vivid contrast the horrors of war and the beauties of nature. Of the music proper an account will be found in another column. But to the appeals to the senses which rest on beautiful scenery, impressive singing, and sonorous orchestration there yet remains to be added a most potent element in the sum total. We refer to the tremendous fusillade in the opening scene, and the even more tremendous cannonade at the beginning of the second act. Visitors to the Naval Exhibition at Chelsea, a few years back, will remember those exceedingly ingenious, but very noisy night attacks so realistically carried out in the arena. The shooting in "La Navarraise" is not so prolonged, but it is even more startling, as the gunners are out of sight and the audience are therefore deprived of any ocular warning as to what is in store for them. As a writer in the Sunday Times most justly remarks: "For an equivalent amount of sensation in the time [the whole opera only lasts fifty minutes] it would be impossible to find a parallel in anything but a Drury Lane or Adelphi melodrama. The roar of cannon and rattle of musketry that went on for some minutes after the curtain rose on Wednesday irresistibly called to mind the memorable fight wherein the Maxim guns figured in 'A Life of Pleasure'; nor was it the less terrific because it was not seen as well as heard." The critic omits to mention another most pungent factor in the aggregate of sensations which the spectator has to face in "La Navarraise": we refer to the smoke and the smell of gunpowder. In short, it is a piece which appeals not only to the eyes and ears, but to the nose as well. Spontini, after hearing a performance of Berlioz's "Symphonie Funèbre et Triomphale," congratulated the composer on his musique ébranlante. The epithet was certainly well deserved, but it is even more appropriate and applicable to the operatic ordnance of M. Massenet.

For our own part, at the risk of being called pedantic and out of touch with modern tendencies, we find it impossible to welcome with enthusiasm this latest development of operatic realism in which the "massing of sonorities" is reinforced, not by stage thunder, as in the last act of "Rigoletto," but by the roar of artillery. Of course we shall be told that there is nothing intrinsically new in the device, and to a certain extent the objection may be maintained. The employment of firearms in opera is as old as the century, while in non-operatic works, especially of a festal nature, exuberant composers, particularly of the Transatlantic school, have often had recourse to explosive means by way of accentuating climax. A story is told of a historic performance of the British Army Quadrilles in Manchester, at which a small cannon was discharged at the back of the hall, with the untoward result that the entire audience evacuated the building to avoid being suffocated by the villainous saltpetre. Many similar instances might be multiplied. But a difference in degree may often amount to a difference in kind. Between the single shot in "Carmen," for instance, and the cannonading in "La Navarraise," there is difference so wide that the two cases cannot be fairly referred to in the same category. At any rate, M. Massenet holds the record for the moment. The question is how long will he be permitted to enjoy the privilege of being the composer who has made the acutest impression on the tympanum of the musical world?

In this connection it may not be amiss to quote a saying of Moritz Hauptmann's: "The worst of over-seasoning," he remarks, "is that it vitiates the taste; purity seems vapid by comparison. We get accustomed to anything, and it may become second nature to walk on stilts." The "record-breaking" mania would seem to have infected the world of Art as well as that of athletics. Composers, like painters and novelists, are consumed with the desire not so much to captivate their public as, in the expressive cant phrase of the day, to make it "sit up." And in the endeavour to attain this end such means as those which we have discussed in the foregoing remarks are employed with results which, though undoubtedly startling, can hardly be pronounced altogether satisfactory. What Dr. Parry, in the book from which we have quoted above, remarks of the orchestra of Berlioz, is singularly appropriate to the sensationalism of his successors: "Though it makes a great noise, and works on the raw impressionable side of human creatures, and excites them to an abnormal degree, the effect it produces is not really so imposing as that of things which make much less show—for instance, the opening of Beethoven's B flat Symphony, which requires only seven different instruments to play it, and is all pianissimo."

Cannon are all very well on the field of battle, or at manœuvres or a review; but on the operatic stage they add a new terror to life and bid fair to supplant the sovereignty of harmony by the dominion of din.

FROM MY STUDY.

The reader now has before him a charming portrait of the late Mrs. Anderson, regarding whose personality and powers the present generation knows nothing save by repute. A hundred and five years have passed since this pianist and professor was born, yet it seems only a little while ago that those who knew her sometimes recognised at entertainments and in society the venerable figure of the Queen's music mistress, and were conscious of looking upon a survival, not only of a past age, but of decaying, or already vanished artistic tastes and methods. Mrs. Anderson, it should be remembered, was a product of the last century.

To Bath belongs the credit of having given birth to the subject of these remarks. The city of Loder and Field has other such distinctions, and no wonder, for if a musical spirit could not be engendered there, in that some time resort of cultured society, and happy hunting-ground of accomplished professionals, where could one expect to find it?

> Fair city of the sun! who sit'st secure
> In smiling beauty o'er the glittering vale,
> Where willowy Avon winds its waters pure,
> Fraught with the fragrance of the Western gale—
> Compelled by thee, Disease forsakes its pale
> And sickly victim, while Despair, that clings
> In viperous foldings, can no more assail,— > Scared by the presence of thy healthful springs;
> But round thee Joy and Peace spread their empurpled wings.

Visitors to Bath a century ago were not all, nor even in large proportion, "pale and sickly victims." Read what Mr. Simkin Barnard wrote to his lady mother:

> Of all the gay places the world can afford,
> By gentle and simple for pastime adored,
> Fine balls and fine concerts, fine buildings and springs,
> Fine walks and fine views, and a thousand fine things
> (Not to mention the sweet situation and air),
> What place, my dear mother, with Bath can compare?

The city was in its ripened glory when a girl-child was born to John Philpot, a professor and seller of music. John, it may be supposed, was a good deal mixed up with the abounding concerts that helped to cheer visitors during the season, and it is no less easy to imagine that his daughter, Lucy, enjoyed ample opportunities of deriving benefit from them. At any rate, her musical tastes flourished amain; impelling her towards the pianoforte as a means of expression. But John Philpot does not appear to have discerned the capacity of his child, or, if he did, was too careless to see about its cultivation. Thus it happened that Lucy had no regular tuition; some occasional lessons from a relative being all the help afforded her. The girl, however, was fortunate in the guidance of her own native taste and quickness of perception. Without their knowing it, she sat at the feet of all the distinguished pianists who visited Bath, picking up hints from one and another till, in the end, she herself became a performer and was encouraged to adopt music as a profession. After some years, Miss Philpot's state of health made necessary a change from the enervating atmosphere of her native city. She then settled in London: rapidly coming to the front even against the keen competition of metropolitan life. At the age of thirty-one—that is to say, in 1820—she married George Frederic Anderson, then an orchestral violinist of repute, afterwards "Master of the Queen's Musick." Mrs. Anderson, like her husband, had a long and close connection with the Court, being first appointed professor of the pianoforte to the Princess Victoria, and afterwards to Queen Victoria's daughters. This, of course, implied the highest rank in her profession. In July, 1822, Mrs. Anderson played at a Concert of the Philharmonic Society, on that occasion being the pioneer of her sex. The work she took in hand was a new Concerto by Hummel. "Mrs. A.," said the Musical Magazine (and this is all it did say), "is to be esteemed a very fine performer, but, from some of those unaccountable chances which attend public exhibitions, her merits were not appreciated." Probably the engagement of a female pianist was resented, and almost certainly the artist suffered for having the misfortune to be an Englishwoman. It is worthy of note that another Bath pianist, John Field, appeared at the Philharmonic Concerts in the same season.

For a sympathetic sketch of Johann Ludwig Dussek's career, readers should turn to Grove's

"Dictionary of Music and Musicians," where they will find one from the pen of the late J. W. Davison, an ardent admirer of the composer-pianist. No one plays Dussek in public since Madame Arabella Goddard ceased to do platform work, but his music remains in the hands of all who admire elegance, grace, and beauty, even when they do not wear the garb of to-day. He was once accounted a great man by persons well able to judge. Joseph Haydn, writing to Dussek's father, remarked: "You have one of the most upright, moral, and, in music, most eminent of men for a son." Spohr describes his playing as "real artistic perfection." Rellstab credits him with having accomplished "a vast deal more for the elevation of the pianoforte than most of his contemporaries." Fétis, noticing some performances by Dussek in Paris, said: "The broad and noble style of this artist, his method of singing on an instrument which possessed no sustained sounds, the neatness, delicacy and brilliancy of his play, in short, procured him a triumph of which there had been no previous example." Thayer quotes: "Dussek, the man of genius, the richly endowed and solidly trained artist, was known, honoured, and loved by the entire musical world. . . . He has done nearly as much as Haydn, and probably not less than Mozart, to make German music known and respected in other lands" (this remark refers to the state of things eighty years ago). "As a virtuoso, he is unanimously placed in the very foremost rank. In rapidity and sureness of execution, in mastery of the greatest difficulties, it would be hard to find a pianist who surpassed him." Finally, there is the evidence of Thomaschek: "His fingers were like a company of ten singers, endowed with equal executive powers, and able to produce with the utmost perfection whatever their director could require." It is added: "Dussek was the first who placed his instrument sideways upon the platform, in which our pianoforte heroes now all follow him, though they may have no very interesting profile to exhibit." No one claims for Dussek as a composer the rank of a great master. Said Mendelssohn to Davison on one occasion: "He was a prodigal." This Davison explains as follows: "Dussek, who failed for want of striving to make the most of the endowments of nature, might have become a musician of the highest acquirements had the case been otherwise. He squandered away melody as a spendthrift would squander away money, not pausing for an instant to consider its value if put out to interest. It is sad to reflect upon the number of genuine melodies that, coming so readily from his pen, were left, as Sancho Panza would say, as 'bare as they were born,' though almost every one of them might have been developed into something lasting and beautiful." It is this wild abundance of melody which makes Dussek's music, his pianoforte sonatas especially, engaging. The natural eloquence is so great, the art so naïve that one feels in presence of a delightful child. In this Dussek had some affinity with Schubert, who, however, was vastly superior in imagination and musical feeling. Dussek was born at Czaslau, Bohemia, February 9, 1761, and died at St. Germain-en-

Laye, France, March 20, 1812. The highest opus figure of his works is seventy-seven, but there are many others not in the numbered list.

With the portraits of Mrs. Anderson and Dussek is now given a reproduction of a lithograph, itself a reproduction of a painting by Friehuber, who represents himself, on the left of the group, in a sentimental and meditative attitude. I find no mention of Friehuber in Champlin and Perkins' "Cyclopædia of Painters and Paintings," but the evidence of this work goes to show that at least he could turn out good portraits. Liszt, the central figure with the long hair, velvet coat, and upturned face, is an admirable likeness, judging by other portraits of the master at about the same age. The attitude, however, may be too affected; too much in the nature of a studied posture. There is no evidence to show that the great pianist indulged in such a very elementary method of being interesting. He did not need it, and was too much of an artist to stoop to trickery. Otherwise, there can be no doubt that this is an excellent presentment of Liszt as he appeared amongst his friends when in the flower of his age. Ernst, who has a place on the right of the picture, passed away thirty years ago, but many surviving amateurs recollect his appearances in London and can vividly recall the aspect of the man, and the tricks à la Paganini, with which he excited general wonder. Paganini, it should be said, was this great violinist's hero. When young, he followed the Italian master from town to town like his shadow, ever studying his manner and execution, till at last he grew, as far as that was possible, into the same image. Ernst appeared in London in 1844—the Joachim year—and played at the Philharmonic Concerts with such success that he became an annual visitor to our shores, at last taking up his residence here. Unhappily, like Paganini, he had but poor health. For some time before his retirement he discharged public duties with difficulty, and appealed by his physical aspect as much to the sympathy of his audience as by his performances to their admiration. Ernst, while a great artist, was very much a virtuoso, and sometimes abused his gifts by executing farmyard imitations, and such like, in order to catch the voices of the vulgar. "Ernst's playing," says one of his biographers, "was distinguished by great boldness in the execution of technical difficulties of the most hazardous character. . . . But it must not be supposed that he was a mere virtuoso. Ernst was a thorough musician, and although critics have found fault with his reading of classical music, on the other hand very competent judges have pronounced him to have been an excellent quartet-player." Born at Brünn in 1814, this violinist died at Nice in 1865.

The two men in the background of the picture are Berlioz and Czerny. Taking the Berlioz portrait as correct, the eccentric French master was not then the striking figure he afterwards became. There was less suggestion of the eagle about him. His appearance in a group with Liszt is quite appropriate. They were on the best of terms, being mutually attracted, each by a brilliancy equal to, yet differing from his own. Biographical details of Berlioz would here be quite superfluous.

Carl Czerny stands among the younger men as in some sort a link between them and the giants of the classical age. He was born in 1791, twenty years before his pupil, Liszt, twenty-three years earlier than Ernst, and twelve years in advance of Berlioz. In his way he was as great as any of them. That way did not include figuring before the public. Czerny's sensitiveness and love of retirement led him, at an early age, to abandon Concert performances, and devote himself to composition and teaching. How laboriously he worked in both departments of his art! His printed productions are nearly 1,000 in number, and include 24 masses, with 300 graduales and offertoires, and his catalogue runs up to Op. 798! Yet all, save certain teaching pieces and a few arrangements, are as dead as last year's oak-leaves, and the gigantic efforts expended upon them led, comparatively speaking, to nothing. "He weakened his creative powers," says a writer, "by over-production, and the effect has been that the host of lesser works have involved the really good ones in undeserved forgetfulness." Personally, Czerny seems to have been a loveable man. It is said of him that he was "modest and simple in his manner of life, courteous and friendly in his behaviour, just and kindly in his judgment on matters of art, and helpful to all young artists who came in his way. His disposition was so gentle that he shrank from a harsh or coarse word, even spoken in jest, which was partly the cause of his living so much in retirement."

Reference was made in last month's Musical Times to the some-while practice of mounting sentries on the stage when Majesty visited the Opera in state. Apropos I read in a pamphlet, entitled "Odds and Ends about Covent Garden," published in the interest of Evans's Supper and Music Rooms: "About 1750, soldiers stood on the stage in silver-laced hats, long skirts and swords, with their arms placed horizontally, not down as now. When the King came the Beefeaters took their stations. The soldiers who stood upon the stage withdrew when a pantomime was performed." From this it would seem that stage sentries were regularly posted.

In the Guardian of April 2, 1713, the following paragraph may be read: "It was a cause of great sorrow and melancholy to me some nights ago to see a crowd in the habits of the gentry of England stupid to the noblest sentiments we have. The circumstance happened in the scene of distress between Piercy and Ann Bullin. One of the sentinels who stood on the stage to prevent the disorders which the most unmanly race of young men that were ever seen in any age frequently raise in public assemblies, upon Piercy's beseeching to be heard, burst into tears, upon which the greater part of the audience fell into a loud and ignorant laughter, which others, who were touched with the liberal compassion in the poor fellow, could hardly suppress by their clapping. But the man, without the least confusion or shame in his countenance for what had happened, wiped away the tears and was still intent upon the play. The distress still rising, the soldier was so much moved that he was obliged to turn his face from the audience, to their no small merriment. Piercy had the gallantry to take notice of his honest heart, and, I am told, gave him a crown to help him in his affliction. It is certain this poor fellow, in his humble condition, had such a lively compassion as a soul unwedded to the world; were it otherwise, gay lights and dresses, with the appearance of people of fashion and wealth, to which his fortune could not be familiar, would have taken up all his attention and admiration." Truly a pretty glimpse of Thomas Atkins 180 years ago.

The practice of admitting spectators to the stage was of old-standing even in 1713. Thus Lenton in his "Young Gallant's Whirligig" (1629):

> This golden ass, in this hard iron age,
> Aspireth now to sit upon the stage;
> Looks round about, then views his glorious self,
> Throws money here and there, swearing hang pelf,
> As if the splendour of his mightiness
> Should never see worse days, nor feel distress.

A three-legged stool was all the accommodation provided for the stage dandies, and was charged sixpence (subsequently a shilling) extra. This stool each man carried in his hand on to the stage. When the supply was exhausted, the gallants stood about or lay down upon the rushes with which the boards were then strewed. The roystering blades were often disorderly. In the time of Charles II., matters reached such a pitch that the King intervened, and issued an order in the following terms: "Whereas complaint hath been made unto us of great disorders in the Attiring-house (through which admittance was gained to the stage) of the Theatre of our dearest brother the Duke of York, under the government of our trusty and well-beloved Sir Wm. Davenant, by the resort of persons thither to the hindrance of the actors and interruption of the scenes. Our will and pleasure is that no person of what quality soever do presume to enter at the door of the Attiring-house, but such only as do belong to the Company and are employed by them. Requiring the guards attending there, and all whom it may concern, to see that obedience be given hereunto," &c. This order, as we have seen, was not enforced in 1713. At the time of the "Beggars' Opera" seats were provided at the wings for "quality." According to the evidence of Hogarth's picture, these were something like church choir-stalls, rising in tiers one above another. X.

S. S. WESLEY'S ORGAN COMPOSITIONS.

Considerable interest having been aroused by the publication by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. of a new edition of certain important compositions for the organ by S. S. Wesley, the following remarks by the Editor of the series, Dr. G. M. Garrett, will, we are sure, be welcome to our readers. To organists they will certainly need no recommendation.

In any consideration of the value and importance of Samuel Sebastian Wesley's compositions for the instrument on which he was admitted to be one of the greatest performers of his time, regard must be had to the condition of organ music, and the capabilities of the organs of the period. As to the latter, it must be remembered that the days of "short octaves," "sticker couplers," and "pull down" pedals had by no means passed away. Even in comparatively new organs of the time, not less diversity of touch than of compass was to be found. In my own days of pupilage I had to play on three organs, respectively of "G," "F," and "C" manuals, and each having different pedal compass, pro rata! Even where a pedal stop was to be found, it was commonly a single one, and probably a great "booming" double diapason, slow of speech! Both manual and pedal "action" was woefully heavy and irregular; and it would have been difficult to say whether any prolonged performance on the "Gt. organ Full, with Trumpet and Sw. Coup." was more distressing to the organist than to the bellows-blower! Pedal playing was, literally, in its infancy. The "voluntaries" of Stanley and Dupuis, with their right-hand excursions in the upper half of the manuals, and their "Solo Cornet Stop" effects, were still popular. The compositions of Thomas Adams, doubtless greatly superior, were highly esteemed by the more advanced school of organists, and are still of interest, as foreshadowing so clearly some of the characteristics of the style and manner of the later "French" writers—Lefèbure-Wély, for example. The Chevalier Neukomm, who appeared as a public performer in London in 1829, had written much for the organ, and played his own compositions chiefly. Some isolated movements here and there are sober and musicianly; but most of his works are disfigured by ridiculous attempts at realistic effect. Pedal stops "half-drawn," with a "clump" of notes in the Bass Manual, to imitate thunder; fearful and wonderful combinations of Mixtures and eight feet stops, to imitate lightning; other strange devices to imitate rain and hail; in short, a "whole bag of tricks"! Wesley, at this time nineteen years of age, resident in London (I believe he was then Organist of St. John's, Waterloo Road), in all probability may have listened to some of these notable achievements; but he did not imitate them! In fact, with the single exception of some of the more elaborate compositions of his father, the organ works of S. S. Wesley exhibit an advance in almost every really important musical respect which is simply marvellous. Doubtless the devotion of his distinguished father to the works of Sebastian Bach had its effect on the musical temperament of the son. It may be, and probably is true, that we owe the Prelude and Fugue in C sharp minor to the "Bach" influence. But the same can hardly be said of the Andante in G, or the Larghetto in F sharp minor (Nos. 1 and 2 of the new series), these and others which might be named were absolutely new works. In charm of melody, in richness and novelty of harmony, and in legitimate "organ" character they still remain unsurpassed. In the last twenty years a very large quantity of most admirable organ music has been produced by English writers; but it may be doubted whether any of them have gone really farther, in the points above-named, than Wesley.

That works so intrinsically good should so long have remained little known seems, at first, surprising. But it must be remembered that with the single exception of the C sharp minor Prelude and Fugue, all Wesley's earlier organ works were written for a "G" or "F" organ, and that for some inscrutable reason Wesley never would alter them when the "C" manual and pedal board became general, and the "Pedal Organ" began to assume something like its proper proportion in the schemes of English Instruments. In later editions of the "Six Pieces" Wesley contented himself with the addition of a note: "N.B.—In organs of the German compass, use a 16-ft. stop and play an Octave higher"; but this direction was manifestly insufficient. The first half of it was easily followed; but the second involved a disturbance of the relative positions of the L.H. and Pedal notes, which would frequently have destroyed the effect which the composer evidently intended.

To the important matter of "registering" Wesley frequently paid little, if any, attention. In the original edition of the "First set of Three pieces for a Chamber Organ," the first movement, seven pages, has no suggestion of stops, or effects (excepting the "M.M. 112 = ♪") until the last page, when there are marks of "cres.," "dim.," "legato," and "p." The second movement is marked 120 = ♪ but has no mark of any sort or kind which refers to "registering." The Fugue is similarly treated, and many other like examples might be quoted. Again, it is impossible to avoid admitting the fact that Wesley was not a careful editor! He frequently added very materially to the difficulty of reading and playing complicated passages by the way in which the notes were placed on the staves. In his volume of "Psalm Tunes" (mentioned below) it is odd to find in a second edition a tune which has three minims in a bar bearing the time-signature ¢, and the metres of some of the tunes incorrectly stated! "Accidentals" also were treated in a very eccentric fashion. It is evident that such conditions could hardly add to the probabilities of the general acceptance of the works. Players could not fairly be blamed if they did not perform music of which the composer had given them no other means of knowing his intentions than the bare notes, and which they would have to re-arrange for an organ of different pedal compass to that for which they were printed. And the existence of these conditions has not made the task of re-editing less difficult or less anxious. I have endeavoured (1) to alter the text as little as possible; (2) to adhere closely, in suggesting "registering" and other effects, to my remembrance of Wesley's own treatment of these works, and to the advice of some of those who, as Wesley's pupils, enjoyed a like advantage; and here I have gratefully to acknowledge the valuable assistance I have received from Dr. G. B. Arnold, Dr. F. E. Gladstone, Mr. T. Aylward, and Mr. Kendrick Pyne.

In one instance I have felt it desirable to "re-cast" an entire movement. The "Choral Song" was, practically, written for the pianoforte. The right hand contained the harmonies in the principal subject, and the left hand, for the most part, only an octave bass. I have re-written the movement, but retained all the original harmonies.

Some account of the principal works included in the new edition may not be without interest. Of the C sharp minor Prelude and Fugue there are in existence two distinct versions. The first, which was probably one of Wesley's earliest organ works (as "The Wilderness" was one of his first anthems), was published, in upright form, with the following title:—"A Studio for the Organ, exemplified in a series of Exercises in the Strict and Free Styles, intended as Voluntaries for the use of Organists. Composed and Inscribed to Vincent Novello, Esq., by Samuel Sebastian Wesley. No. 1." The publisher was J. Dean, 148, New Bond Street, London. It may be noted as a singular coincidence that both Wesley and his publisher found their way to Winchester in later years; Wesley as Organist of the Cathedral and College, and Dean (who gave up his publishing business) as Station Master on the London and South-Western Railway. "No. 1" had no successor. It was not unnoticed, however, for a German organist, "C. F. Becker," included it in a collection of high-class compositions of which he was the editor. Becker appended to his version the note "Nach einer gestochenen Ausgabe, London, 1800"; which, as Wesley was born in 1810, is sufficiently startling. But this was not the most startling circumstance. Becker was good enough to re-write the Fugue! He disregarded altogether Wesley's treatment of the Pedal part, and, after the first thirteen bars, kept the Pedals "going" (with two rests of only twelve bars) throughout.

Some years after this Wesley printed a second version of the work. He lengthened the Prelude from twenty-six bars to forty-four, and altered the Fugue considerably, omitting altogether the episode in C sharp major. Opinions vary, amongst capable judges, as to the respective merits of the two versions. It must, however, be remembered that the second version was, in the composer's opinion, necessary; and it is reasonable to suppose that it was the result of mature consideration. Both versions are now published. The Fugue, in both editions, is directed to be played "Full, without Reeds." I have ventured to append to the copies a suggestion of different treatment, as the character of the subject seems to me to justify rather soft than loud effect, until the majestic and masterly quadruple entrance of the subject near the close of the Fugue.

The two sets of "Three Pieces for a Chamber Organ," dedicated to Lady Acland, were probably written during Dr. Wesley's residence in Exeter, 1835-42. He was then frequently at Killerton, Sir Thomas Dyke Acland's residence, and played on an organ in the house, of which Sir T. D. Acland's kindness enables me to give the following particulars. It was an "F" organ, at first having only one manual; but a second manual and some Pedal pipes were added about Wesley's time. It contained Open and Stopped Diapasons, Dulciana, Flute, Principal 12th, 15th, Sesquialtra, Cornet, Hautboy, Trumpet, and Double Diapason. The compass of this instrument accounts for the Pedal range of the second number of the First Set of Pieces; and possibly the fact of there having been at the time only one manual may account for the lack of "registering" before named. Supposing the additional manual to have been added between the production of the first and second sets, the full directions for "registering" which are given in No. 2 of the second set, the Larghetto in F sharp minor (perhaps the most generally known of all Wesley's organ works) would be accounted for. It may be noticed that in the original edition the melody is assigned to "Swell-Reed Solo," and the accompaniment to "Dulciana G.O."; while the variation is given (R.H.) to "Claribella or Stopd. Diap., G.O.," and L.H. to "Swell Diap. and Prin." These combinations were obtainable in the organ above described. (I have called the movement Larghetto; but, as a matter of fact, it has, in the first edition, neither name nor metronomic sign.) I have always considered that the Andante in F (No. 5 of the new edition) is a complete illustration of Wesley's extraordinary technical power as a player. It demands clear, crisp, part-playing; the power of changing the position of the hand instantaneously and with certainty; and a touch of the closest and smoothest character. These were among Wesley's most notable qualities as a performer. They are illustrated also in No. 10 of the new edition—the Variations and Fugue on the National Anthem. This work, interesting as a specimen of the "bravura" solo organ piece of its time, can hardly rank as one of its composer's representative works. It is not, however, devoid of certain peculiarly "Wesley-" an touches—notably the Pedal passages in Var. 3, Var. 6, and the bold and rapid changes of harmony on page 11.

Of the remaining numbers only one need be specially mentioned. The "Andante Cantabile" in G was written for performance at the Agricultural Hall. It shows that Wesley, though at that time no longer young, was quite "in touch" with the best effects which could be produced on a modern organ. It is, veritably, a gem. The original edition was printed in a four-stave score. This, however, was quite unnecessary, and I hope its reduction to the customary three-stave score will be the means of introducing a most lovely movement into general use.

Lastly, it remains to say a word or two regarding another of Wesley's early organ works—the "Selection of Psalm Tunes, adapted expressly to the English Organ with Pedals." (This was called "No. 1," and a No. 2 was announced, but never published.) These were published about the year 1838 in a single volume, and reached a second edition. They are now issued in separate parts, and I have altered the original sequence of the tunes with a view to making each part contain a specimen of their varied treatment, from the simplest four-part harmony on the manuals only to elaborate free treatment, with independent pedal. In the original edition, all the tunes selected had "interludes" between each verse. I have retained only those which appeared to me to be of the greatest interest, and I have omitted one or two tunes which were treated in an exactly similar way to others already there. I have ventured to add to the "Old 100th" (No. 12, new edition) a setting with the melody in the bass, from my own remembrance of hearing Wesley thus play it at Winchester; and to "Westminster" (No. 13) a somewhat similar arrangement. I believe that organ students will find in these tunes a most valuable and interesting set of studies.

BEETHOVEN'S SKETCH BOOKS.

By J. S. Shedlock, B.A.

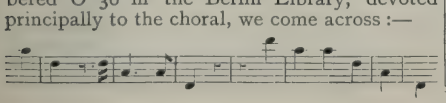
No. III.—THE CHORAL SYMPHONY.

Beethoven made many Sketches for his Op. 125, and Nottebohm in his "Zweite Beethoveniana" devotes a long chapter to them. He was far from exhausting the mine, however, as seems evident from those we now present to our readers, which, with the exception of one or two—quoted from Nottebohm for the sake of the context—are here printed for the first time.

In a Sketch Book of fifty-five sheets, numbered O 36 in the Berlin Library, devoted principally to the choral, we come across:—



and—

As usual, Beethoven seems to see a long way ahead, for we have—the approach to the Coda of the first movement, but not, as yet, possessing the intensity of rhythm of the printed passage.

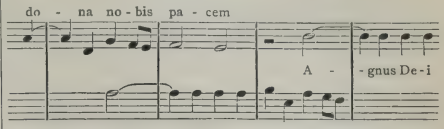
Suddenly we meet with the following, standing alone on the first two staves of a page—



(which certainly bears relationship to the Agnus Dei of the Second Mass), followed by a canonic working of the figure mentioned above—

All of a sudden we find the master at work on the slow movement—

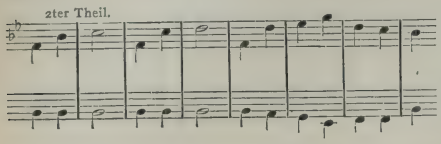
Soon afterwards comes—underneath which is written in pencil, "Vor der Freude." But of his plans with regard to a Finale we shall soon again have an opportunity of speaking. Beethoven now returns to the first movement. Above a sketch of the opening bars we find, with the notes in pencil and the three strokes in ink—

This opening much occupied his thoughts. In another place he wrote over the same notes with two strokes:

"Anfangs vielleicht auch Triolen."

Such small details are the sign of a great master.

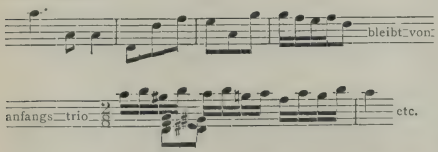
But soon he seems to be looking ahead, and forming plans for the other movements. We have—



What this was meant for it is difficult to say—perhaps for the slow movement. The following, if compared with the opening bars of the Adagio, is interesting—

Next we have—

and then—



All these are on the same page, and from them we learn how Beethoven seemed to have visions more or less distinct of the various movements. Later on, after many sketches for the first movement, we get another glimpse of the Adagio—

The opening of the above recalls the theme of the slow movement of the Sonate Pathétique (Op. 13), but the reminiscence was probably an unconscious one. The melodic progression of the second bar and three-quarters of the third is, anyhow, common to both themes.

Nottebohm, in his "Zweite Beethoveniana" (p. 177), quotes a sketch, from some loose leaves, of the Adagio of the Ninth Symphony, commencing thus—

This begins in the same way as our example, but the bars which follow conclusively show that Beethoven was occupied with the slow movement of the Choral.

The above sketch is in pencil; underneath it we have the following interesting bars in ink—

Then the master seems to be uncertain. There is a sketch for an Introductio in G minor, but, underneath, the above theme with the following remark:

"Variationen oder erster Theil in d moll."

Further, on the same page, a scheme for an Alla marcia; also the familiar phrase—marked alla Menuetto. Here the opening quaver and tie are in pencil, but the rest of the sketch is in ink. We soon come to a sketch of the Scherzo, approaching closely to the printed version, and then to—

But suddenly there comes a change over the spirit of the composer's dream. We have—with further sketches and words. But he returns to the slow movement—and we see foreshadowings of the Coda—

The end, indeed, was much in his thoughts; in another place we find—and on the previous page, before some notes, he writes:

"Zum Ende des Adagios."

The following sketches are well worth quoting—

Then Beethoven returns to the Scherzo. It seems as if he would never get the theme into proper shape. Here is another attempt—and we catch a glimpse of the Trio—

But in another book (W. 30) the same is written out, with the last two bars thus—

At last we have—with a wildly written Anfang under it.

At the top of one page Beethoven has written in pencil:

"Morgen Stund hat Gold im Mund" (Morning hours, golden hours)

an excellent proverb for composers who love to burn the midnight oil.

Later on, after some sketches for a vocal Finale, we have—

have the figures 1000 written over them, often used by Beethoven, and evidently some special private mark of his own.

Then follow workings for the Adagio—

A page with sketches for a vocal Finale is, however, followed by—

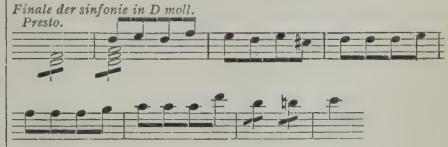
Beethoven seems, as yet, not to have made up his mind. In another Sketch Book (U. 20) we find—



How undecided the composer seems to have been! Even in a very late Sketch Book (written with pencil), devoted entirely to the Choral Symphony, after long workings for the vocal part, we find, just at the end—part of a sketch for a Finale instromentale.

Under some sketches for the Adagio theme there is written:—

"Oder gleich in g der $\frac{3}{4}$ sehr moderat."

This hinting at keys while, as yet, the principal theme was in embryonic form, is very remarkable. Again we plunge suddenly into sketches for the vocal music. The following—shows an approach to the printed version, but has not its mystic state of expectancy.

Here is an interesting specimen of the master "making" music—then, again, in a passage marked "meilleur," we have—

Here are sketches for the Finale:—

In the printed version, the reminiscence of the heavenly melody of the Adagio is still further shortened.

In the top margin of one page of the Sketch Book we find—

28	56	40	50

Was Beethoven counting bars or money?

In our first article of this series we omitted to state that the sketch of the "Walzer pour le Clavier" refers to the "Ecossaise," published in the Breitkopf and Härtel "Beethoven Supplement" (Series 25, No. 305, p. 366), with date 1825.

ORLANDO DI LASSO.

THE name of Orlando di Lasso, the tercentary of whose death is being celebrated this summer in Belgium and Bavaria, conveys but little meaning to the majority of English musicians and amateurs. The unfavourable opinion of him expressed by Burney and Baini has too often been received as beyond dispute; his works are not easily accessible for study, and his music is very rarely performed, so that to all except a few students he is looked on merely as the last representative of a school in which ingenuity too often took the place of inspiration. How unjust this estimate of the great Netherlandish master is, anyone who has even cursorily studied such of his compositions as have been reprinted will know. Without assigning to him so high a place as does Proske, who calls him a "universal genius," the more familiar Orlando di Lasso's music becomes, the higher will be the admiration for the extraordinary genius which the composer possessed. His fame, so widely spread in his own day, has been overshadowed in modern times by that of his great contemporary, Palestrina; yet, apart from the wonderful melodic gift which the Roman master possessed in so high a degree, there is hardly any quality in Palestrina's music which is not to be found to an equal extent in that of Orlando di Lasso, while in a distinct feeling for dramatic effect, the Netherlander must certainly be looked upon as more a precursor of modern music than was his Italian contemporary. Among the enormous mass of his compositions—according to the estimate of one of his latest biographers, he composed 2,337 distinct works—there is scarcely any field which he left untouched. For pure loftiness of religious feeling the Penitential Psalms, written about 1560 for his patron, Albert V., have long been justly considered his masterpiece; in them, different as the style is, he approaches nearest to the spirit of Palestrina. In his numerous Chansons he displays the delicacy and verve of the French school; in his "Deutsche Lieder," with their rollicking humour and love of the good things of life, he is essentially German, while his Madrigals and Villanelle are as Italian in spirit as any of the hundreds of similar works which were published in such numbers by the Venetian printing-presses of the sixteenth century. His experiments in novel effects, especially in the use of chromatics, often recall similar attempts which are so remarkable in the works of John Bull, while the form of his Motets clearly shows him to be the artistic descendant of Josquin des Près and the masters of the earlier Netherlandish school. His love for musical quips, such as the setting of the words "Super flumina Babylonis illic sedimus et flevimus," in which the whole text is spelt out, letter by letter and syllable by syllable; or the passage in "Ave color vini clari," where the skipping of fleas is represented by a sudden passage of demisemiquavers; or the imitation of a goose in "Audite nova," or of a hen in "Es thut sich alles verkehren," have often been noticed; but these passages are mere isolated examples of humour, and to lay too much stress upon them is to give a false idea of the real power and dignity of which he was capable. How much he was impressed by his texts may be seen by his treatment of the Penitential Psalms, by many of his 180 Magnificats, by his fifty-one Masses, or by such masterly works as his Motets, "Tristis est anima mea," "Justorum animæ," or the setting of that most impressive of mediæval sequences, "Audi Tellus." It is in these that the comparison of him to Michael Angelo—as of Palestrina to Raphael—is justified. Even in the domain of instrumental music, which was comparatively little cultivated in Italy and Germany in the sixteenth century, his two-part Ricercari are interesting, and it is a curious fact that of all his works, the volume in which these occur was the only one to be reprinted in England, twenty-one years after its first publication in Munich. As a man, Lasso is better known than almost any composer of his day. It was his good fortune to find in Albert V. and William V. patrons who thoroughly appreciated his worth and surrounded his life at their Court with all the worldly advantages which royal favour can bestow. With both sovereigns his letters show him to have been on terms of familiarity that did credit to patrons and musician alike. The glimpses which the Munich archives afford of Lasso are charming in the light they throw upon his simple and genial character. At one time his wife writes to the Duke in answer to some official command, because her husband has been playing tennis and is tired, while the composer adds a few lines in his own handwriting, saying how his home is the best in the world. At another Lasso takes the part of Pantaloon in an impromptu Court charade, and wins great applause by the way in which he allows himself to be thrashed in very realistic fashion. His simple piety shows itself in a letter in which he says that his conscience will not let him keep the interest which the Duke had allowed him for a capital sum that he had placed in William V.'s hands, whereupon the latter took back the money but was careful to return it soon after to the composer as a gift. But the chief feature of his character was his unceasing love of work: "So long as God has given me good health, I may not be idle," was his favourite saying, and the motto engraved on a contemporary print of him is, "Pour repos, travail." His post as Master of the Ducal Chapel at Munich was no sinecure, but the mass of compositions he has left—shortly, it is to be hoped, to be made generally accessible by the complete edition projected by Dr. Haberl and Dr. Sandberger—is the best record of the unfailing industry and power of production which render him so interesting a figure among the great composers.

In our correspondence columns will be found a letter from Mr. Cecil Torr, commenting on the remarks on the Hymn to Apollo in our Jubilee number, and criticising M. Reinach's transcript of the hymn. Alypius gives, p. 11, the following heading to the list of signs on that, and part of the succeeding page: "Φρυγίου τρόπου σημεῖα κατὰ τὸ διάτονον γένος" ("Signs of the Phrygian scale* according to the diatonic genus"), and on p. 32, the heading, "Φρυγίου τρόπου σημεῖα κατὰ τὸ χρωματικὸν γένος" ("Signs of the Phrygian scale according to the chromatic genus"). All the vocal signs are common to both the diatonic and chromatic genus, except the sign for the highest note of each pycnum—therefore five notes out of eighteen. How then can Alypius be said not to "recognise a Phrygian scale as such"? The sign which has been translated A natural occurs as one of the five exceptions: it is the highest note of the pycnum of the uppermost tetrachord. Again, Mr. Torr says: "The conjunct tetrachord is not the same in Phrygian chromatics (sic) and Phrygian diatonics (sic)." We never said it was; but the sign translated as D flat happens to occur in the conjunct tetrachord in both genera. Mr. Torr seems to have been led away by some table, similar to that given in Gevaert, Vol. I., p. 444, in which a scale is arranged in alphabetical order, and to conclude from this that there must have been a note of separate pitch for every letter of the three alphabets, with the exception of the letters Π P Σ, which he mentions. But this method of reasoning soon lands us in great confusion; for if it applies to the Phrygian scale, it must equally apply to all the other scales. It is true that in many cases (though not in all), the pycnum is noted by three successive letters of the alphabet, and that if we place these letters symmetrically at intervals of a third of a tone, we get precisely what Aristoxenus calls a "soft chromatic"; but Aristoxenus also mentions the chroma hemiolion, in which the notes of the pycnum are at the interval of three-eighths of a tone, the enharmonic genus in which the notes are at the interval of one-fourth of a tone, and the chroma toniaion or syntonon, which corresponds with our equal temperament, since the pycnum is formed by two semitones. Now, since Alypius only gives one kind of vocal notation for all four varieties of the pycnum, it is really impossible for us to say for certain which was used in any particular case; and we are compelled to choose the one which seems the most probable. At the time this hymn was written, the enharmonic genus had ceased to be used. It is possible that the trained solo singers would still delight in the nuances of the chroma hemiolion and chroma malakon, but it is scarcely likely that the chorus singers would use any other than the easier and more natural chroma toniaion; and since this hymn was certainly sung by a chorus, we are perfectly justified in considering that the weight of probability points to the use of the last-mentioned variety.

* By scale here is meant key—i.e., the pitch of a series of notes—not mode.

If Mr. Torr will turn to Aristides Quintilianus, p. 23, he will find what seems to us convincing proof of the truth of the contention of Westphal (Aristoxenus, p. 252; "Griechische Harmonik und Melopoeie," 1886, p. 120, &c.); and Bellermann ("Hymnen des Dionysius und Mesomedes," p. 4), that Aristoxenus used equal temperament; for he will there see a list of thirteen scales, the proslambanomenos or lowest note of each of which was placed a semitone higher than its predecessor; and we cannot see how this can possibly agree with the scale of twenty-one sounds to the octave suggested by Mr. Torr. It is very misleading to form a theory from a study of the notation alone, without reference to what is known from other sources. We have not space here to discuss the difficulties to which the former method of reasoning leads. Let us, however, as an example, apply the alphabetical test to the conjunct tetrachord of the Dorian scale, in the chromatic genus. The letters given by Alypius for the pycnum of this tetrachord are N O Π. Now, by Mr. Torr's method of reasoning, we cannot place these letters symmetrically at intervals of a third of a tone, for the letter Ξ is omitted between N and O, and there must therefore be a note between these letters. But what note? On the alphabetical principle, the interval O Π would be half N O, owing to the omission of Ξ between N and O, and this will produce no variety of pycnum that is described by ancient writers. The same kind of difficulty will be found in other intervals. Thus, in the Iastian scale, chromatic genus, four letters are omitted between proslambanomenos and hypate hypaton. Yet we know that this interval could only be a tone in all the genera (Gaudentius, p. 6). Would Mr. Torr propose to divide this tone into five symmetrical intervals?

Mr. Torr complains of the transcript having assigned I and K to the same note. This is to do no more than to assign the names C sharp and D flat to the same sound in modern notation. To the Greek, a change from the conjunct to the disjunct system was a modulation, and having once modulated from the one system to the other, the notation of the new system would be adhered to until the return to the original system. If the "soft" chromatic tuning was used, K would be flatter than I by one-third of a tone. But K has to serve for the second highest note of the conjunct tetrachord in the chroma toniaion, the chroma hemiolion, and the enharmonic genus, as well as in the "soft" chromatic. If the Greeks had a name for every note in the possible varieties of tuning, why should they require to give four notes to the letter K? There never were twenty-one notes in the octave. If we are to count all the possible tunings of the moveable notes, we obtain something like thirty-two notes in the octave. But this the Greeks never did. They looked upon a scale as consisting of so many tetrachords which might be tuned in various ways. They had no general system giving a separate set of letters to each variety of tuning, and their notation never arrived at the symmetry suggested by Mr. Torr. The modern octave, C, C sharp, D flat, D, D sharp, E flat, E, E sharp, F flat, F, F sharp, G flat, G, G sharp, A flat, A, A sharp, B flat, B, B sharp, C, contains twenty-one names of notes, and every third letter represents a natural; but we use only thirteen sounds, and the presumption is that the Greeks did the same, at any rate in their choruses, as we have already mentioned. As to the date of the composition, if, as Mr. Torr suggests may be the case, it was composed long after 279 B.C., the probabilities are all the more in favour of the use of no intervals smaller than a semitone, since we know that even the chromatic genus gradually disappeared, and gave way to the supremacy of the diatonic.

IN the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung, of June 15, Dr. Heinrich Reimann is so exceedingly anxious to prove that M. Reinach's transcription of the Greek Hymn is wrong, both in rhythm and notes, that he is led into one or two absurdities. In the first place, he insists on using the enharmonic genus, which we know from Plutarch had been entirely abandoned in the time of Aristoxenus—i.e., about the epoch of the Macedonian conquest, some sixty years before this hymn could have been composed. In order to show the ancient "enharmonic diesis" (quarter-tone), he makes use of the ridiculous expedient of writing E flat in the vocal part and D sharp in the accompaniment! In the second place, he endeavours to show that the rhythm is not Pæonic (5-time) but Trochaic (3-time), and to represent this he has recourse to a complicated time signature of $\frac{6}{8}\frac{3}{4}$, with changes from triplets to duoles in each bar! He appeals to Rossbach's "Spezielle Metrik" in support of his views, but though it is there (p. 733) distinctly stated that the second half of the trochaic dipody (the $\frac{6}{8}$ bar) cannot be divided into two equal notes, Dr. Reimann does so divide it in nearly every bar. Finally, in his intense desire to prove everyone wrong, he ends by describing M. Reinach's version of the hymn, given in the extra supplement of the Jubilee number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, as a "senseless and brutal falsification" (eine sinnlos-brutale Fälschung). This style of criticism may commend itself to German taste, but it will hardly be approved by English and French readers.

THE estimation in which THE MUSICAL TIMES is held by musicians was strikingly illustrated by the letters printed in our Jubilee number, which, as our readers will remember, contained congratulations from the most eminent composers, conductors, organists, and teachers of the day. These acknowledgments of our services to musical art were naturally in a high degree gratifying; and to-day we have further justification for pleasurable feelings with regard to the position of this journal. In the first place, references to the Jubilee of THE MUSICAL TIMES appeared in over 150 of the leading daily and weekly newspapers of the kingdom —the event in several cases being treated at length, and, in some instances, dealt with in a "leader." Among the most prominent notices in provincial journals may be named those of the Manchester Guardian, The Liverpool Daily Courier, The Western Press, The Newcastle Daily Leader, The Brighton Herald, and The Irish Times. To these and other representatives of the opinions of several millions of English readers we tender a modest and grateful bow, accompanied by the assurance that their praise will greatly stimulate our future efforts to deserve it. But if the press has been appreciative the public has been no less so. The Jubilee number was "sold out" a week after publication and copies are already worth three times their original value. We have no intention, however, of attributing this success entirely to public interest in our fiftieth birthday, great as this may have been; some portion of it is undoubtedly due to the enormous interest excited by our extra supplement, the Greek "Hymn to Apollo," which it was our privilege to first introduce to English readers. The music of the Ancient Greeks has suddenly become an object of attention to those who, before the publication of this fragment, had shown no interest whatever in the subject, and if the result of its publication in this country should bring about a musical Renaissance of any kind it would certainly be pleasant to think that historians of the future might trace its beginnings to the Jubilee number of THE MUSICAL TIMES. Ainsi soit il.

SIR JOSEPH BARNBY has been engaged in the agreeable occupation of telling the people of Leeds that, as regards the cultivation of choral music, they may be regarded as the hub of the musical universe. The occasion was the opening of a College of Music the Messrs. Haddock are founding in that town, and Sir Joseph, as a Yorkshireman speaking to Yorkshiremen, was no doubt entitled to use the language of hyperbole. And, if the whole of the West Riding of Yorkshire be taken into account, there is probably no other area of similar extent producing so many and so powerful choral bodies. Huddersfield, Halifax, and Bradford, for example, as well as Leeds, boast of choral societies second to none in the power and sonority of their voices and the masculine energy of their style. The Leeds Festival chorus was fittingly held up by Sir Joseph as a pattern body of choralists. Under the régime begun at the last Festival it is a thoroughly representative body, drawing its members from the chief musical centres of the Riding, and reflecting the interest and educational value of the Festival upon a proportionately larger area than was the case when it was more exclusively Leeds in its origin. While awarding to Leeds all the credit it deserves for its choral pre-eminence it should, however, not be forgotten that it has a formidable rival in the much older festival centre of the Midlands, Birmingham. Without entering into invidious comparisons, it may at least be maintained that the Birmingham choir has certain qualities of its own in which it is unsurpassed. The perfect balance of its parts, the excellent and even quality of its voices, especially of its unapproachable tenors, and the wonderful finish of its singing, are among these, and to them Sir Joseph Barnby will no doubt be fully prepared to do complete justice, should he have occasion to speak on the subject to a Midland audience. Chorus-singing, however, is not the whole of music, and Sir Joseph did well to call attention to a less satisfactory aspect of the musical situation. Ever since the days when Handel was made a bankrupt through opera, and more than retrieved his fortunes by means of his oratorios, opera has been more or less of an exotic in this country. London is badly enough served in the matter of opera, but Leeds, with close upon 400,000 inhabitants, has to be content with an average of fourteen performances in the course of the year, and these with a band reduced to the smallest possible dimensions, and quite incapable of doing justice to modern scores. It would be unreasonable to find fault with the Carl Rosa Company for these unavoidable shortcomings. The wonder is rather that for the low prices in vogue in the provinces they are able to do so much and so well. The fault is with the provincial public, who have practically no opportunity of learning what opera really is, and therefore are unwilling to pay for an unknown and unappreciated advantage. With Messrs. Haddocks' College, Leeds has now three Institutions for teaching music, so it may be hoped that a higher and more general appreciation of the possibilities of the art may be the result of their amicable rivalry.

Apropos of the reminiscences aroused by our Jubilee number, a correspondent writes:—"In 1844 the great popular movement, initiated in 1841 by Hullah and influentially aided by educational authorities and by the direct encouragement of the State, was in full swing. Although that movement in the end was a comparative failure where Hullah designed and most wished it to succeed—namely, in the elementary schools—there can be no doubt that the strong belief in the musical capacity of the common people strenuously preached by Hullah was one of the main inspirations of the later and more successful school music movement that has lasted down to our own time. To Miss Glover, of Norwich, belongs the credit of the original invention of the Tonic Sol-fa Notation. But to the skill, penetration as to what was practicable in the given circumstances, and impregnable faith of John Curwen (1816-80), a born master of men more than he was a born master of music, belongs the honour and renown of having organised methods that have resulted in the immense strides made in the progress of music in elementary schools during the past fifty years. What is the real worth of this progress? Some critics are disposed to view it pessimistically, and say that Board Schools have merely taught the people to bawl music hall songs. But this is narrow and unfair. The school education in music does not make for vulgarity. It simply has not yet stemmed the tide of other influences that flow in that direction. Capacity must, as a rule, precede culture. Now that capacity has been demonstrated and developed, the next strenuous effort must be to develop good taste. Here is a field for the school music enthusiast. The fact that one of our most distinguished English musicians, Sir John Stainer, is the musical head of the great State department that overlooks the five millions of children in elementary schools, is a hopeful augury of future progress."

IN connection with the tercentenary of Orlando di Lasso's death, on the 14th ult., two valuable contributions to musical literature are forthcoming. These are M. Jules Declève's "Roland de Lassus, sa vie et ses œuvres," published at the master's birthplace, Mons, in Belgium, and the more elaborate "Beiträge zur Geschichte der bayerischen Hofkapelle unter Orlando di Lasso," in three volumes, which Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel announce. The author of the latter work is Dr. Alfred Sandberger, who, as "custos" of the musical section of the Royal Bavarian Court and State Library in Munich, has had exceptional facilities for making the most thorough researches. Dr. Sandberger is also one of the editors of an even more important work. This is nothing less than a complete edition of Orlando's compositions, of which Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel have just issued the prospectus. As it will be published in similar style to this firm's splendid "Gesammtausgaben" of the German classics, it is not too much to say that no more worthy monument could be erected to the memory of the great Flemish master. To give an idea of the magnitude of the undertaking we may state that sixty big folio volumes will be required to exhaust the available material, and as two volumes are promised annually, it will take over a quarter of a century to complete the gigantic task. Dr. Sandberger's co-editor will be Dr. F. X. Haberl, of Ratisbon, who was one of the editors of the complete edition of Palestrina's works, of which the last volume appeared only quite recently, after thirty years' labour. All music-lovers will wish the worthy doctors success, and express a hope that they may live to bring to a conclusion what the publishers declare the most difficult task which they have ever undertaken!

IT is amusing to see Orlando di Lasso referred to by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel as a great German tone-master. Is this merely a slip, or can the Teutonic bump of annexation be responsible for the misstatement? Surely the mere fact of his long residence in Munich cannot justify his being considered German any more than Handel's sojourn amongst us entitles us to call him an English classic. But whether Flemish or German, the town in which Orlando created most of his 2,000 works, and in which he died, has not let the tercentenary pass without a suitable Musical Festival. This took place on the 14th and 15th ult. On the former date a "Serenade" was performed in front of the master's statue, when a chorus from a Magnificat and one of his splendid Penitential Psalms, as well as a Hymn specially composed by Professor Josef Rheinberger, to words by Hermann Lingg, were performed. The programme of the Festival Concert on the 15th included (1) Hymn, "Musica, Dei domum," in six parts; (2*a*) Motet, "Gustate et videte," in five parts; (2*b*) Motet, "Timor et tremor," in six parts; (3*a*) "Je l'aime bien," in four parts; (3*b*) "Es jagt ein Jäger vor dem Holz," in five parts; (3*c*) "O la, o che bon echo," in eight parts; (4) "Quo properas facunde nepos" (Hymn to Albert V. and his consort), in ten parts. Beethoven's Choral Symphony formed a magnificent and appropriate second part to a remarkably interesting Concert.

The Sketch of the 20th ult. has some charming little illustrations of the Church of St. Lawrence, Whitchurch, near Edgware, and a few gossiping remarks respecting Handel's connection with it and the organ contained therein; unfortunately these are very inaccurate and calculated to mislead. For example, the statement that the present church "was formerly the private chapel of Handel's patron, the Duke of Chandos," is an error; the private chapel of the Duke formed a part of the magnificent palace, "Cannons," which stood half-a-mile away from the church referred to. The Duke of Chandos did rebuild the Church of St. Lawrence, which was re-opened for divine service on August 29, 1720, and it is possible that Handel played on the organ on that occasion. It is, however, not a fact that Handel was at any time organist of the church; he performed in the Duke's private chapel, where he had not only an organ, but also a complete orchestra and choir for the execution of those beautiful anthems which memorialise the name and liberality of his wealthy patron. Cannons was sold in 1747, and subsequently pulled down; of course the chapel shared the fate of the rest of the residence, and the organ was purchased for the Church of the Holy Trinity, Gosport, in 1748. It still exists, and is in constant use at that church; some further account of it will be found in the Handel number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, published in December last. The Sketch speaks of "another organ linked with the memories of Handel, and probably more familiar to the public than the before-mentioned: this still leads the children's voices with its mellow notes" at the Foundling Hospital. Unfortunately, Handel's organ was removed from the Foundling some years since and a new one by Bevington erected in its place.

We have had the notes of the musical scale associated with many different—and wholly unrelated—ideas, such as colours, flavours, scents, moods of mind, &c., but it is a novelty to find them illustrating chronology. A lady advertises a series of lectures on "The Divine Motherhood and Music" (sic), in which, if we understand the syllabus aright, that portion of the world's history narrated in the first chapter of Genesis is to be typified or illustrated by the sounding of the note A, the epoch covered by Genesis ii., iii., and iv. by B, while C, D, and E are to take us to the dates 1926 B.C., 666 B.C., and 1896 A.D. respectively. The Millennium is then to be associated with F sharp and the Last Sabbath with G sharp, the other chromatic notes being apparently left out in the cold. A flat probably represents chaos, but we should like to know why nothing is said about F or G natural. Such a combination of theology and musical nomenclature is certainly a curiosity and causes us also to wonder whether the A and B of the lecturer are of any definite pitch, or whether a moveable do is kneaded—we beg pardon—needed. But there is an appropriate scriptural monition concerning the touching of pitch.

An enterprise well deserving the support of British music-lovers is announced by Mr. Ernest Fowles. From a preliminary prospectus forwarded to us by that gentleman we learn that he contemplates the establishment of "Concerts of British Chamber Music," provided he receives the promise of adequate support before the end of July. The Concerts, of which four would constitute the first season, are to be given in the autumn. Miss Fanny Davies, Miss Emily Shinner, and Mr. Whitehouse have already promised their assistance as executants, and the subscription has been fixed at a figure so low that, should the enterprise succeed, it must have a serious influence upon the price of seats at future Concert enterprises. Mr. Fowles offers a numbered stall (transferable) for the four Concerts at the ridiculous price of half-a-guinea! Messrs. Chappell, Stanley Lucas, Tree, Mitchell, and other agents will receive the promise of subscriptions, or these may be sent to Mr. Fowles himself, at Freshwater, Knollys Road, Streatham.

We hear with great regret of the death, on the 23rd ult., at her villa at Ville d'Avray, of Madame Alboni; but the news arrives too late for the insertion in our present issue of an adequate notice of the great contralto's career. She was born in 1824, at Cesena, in Romagna, and made her first public appearance in Bologna at the age of fifteen. In 1846 she made her début in London, at Covent Garden, where her success was so phenomenal that the manager, Mr. Delafield, gave her £2,000 instead of the £500 which had been agreed upon. In spite of the fact that her marvellous voice retained its beauty almost till the last, she was little more than a name to the present generation, for in 1863 she retired into private life. She was twice married—in 1853 to the Marquis Pepoli, and in 1877 to Major Zeigler, an officer of the Republican Guard.

The musical tendencies of the Coleridge family are well known, and their exemplification in the great lawyer who has just passed to his rest was conspicuous. To his many gifts as a scholar, an orator, and a raconteur, Lord Coleridge added a musical taste the influence of which was always well and wisely directed. He was for many years President of the Bach Choir, and gave similar encouragement to other societies, the members of which will long regret the loss of so influential a patron. Of composers, Lord Coleridge preferred Mozart, though he fully appreciated the greatness of Beethoven. He was not much in sympathy with modern developments. Among his intimate friends may be named Sterndale Bennett, H. F. Chorley, Jenny Lind, and Mr. Otto Goldschmidt.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

Exuberant spirits are natural to an undergraduate's age, and sometimes to be indulged as a relief from the serious studies to which, as everybody knows, he devotes the greater part of his days and nights. Even when he vents pent-up energies in making a good time for the college glazier, the public, whatever the authorities may do, have no very severe condemnation. Besides, it is better for him to break a few windows than "carry on" in the gallery of the Sheldonian while proceedings, in their nature grave and dignified, are progressing. I am glad to see him alive to this fact. A recent report of the Oxford Encœnia states: "The number of undergraduates present seems to get less every year." That may be a matter for regret, but the report goes on: "The proceedings from eleven o'clock, when the doors were opened, till twelve, when the procession arrived, were of a dull and decorous character, the jokes being of the feeblest kind, while political allusions were conspicuous by their absence." Even now, in these grave times, dulness is not a quality of the "under-grad."; and if the company felt a little surprised and distressed to see the "daughter of Chaos and eternal Night" enthroned amongst them, that was only natural. Happily, a brilliant idea occurred to the organist, Dr. Roberts. Now, an organist is not expected to be humorous at the post of duty. There even Dr. J. F. Bridge suppresses his ebullient spirits and is as grave as a judge. But Dr. Roberts was not in church. He felt himself called upon to exorcise Dulness, and forthwith struck into that classical and inspiring ditty, "'E dunno where 'e are." At once the gloomy spirit fled. The undergraduate pricked up his ears and gave tongue, chanting the lyric with all the fervour of conviction and the intelligence of a clear understanding. Talk of David before Saul!

These are days of Handelian discoveries, and, on reading the Bradford Daily Argus of the 14th ult., I became much interested in what was, to me, a previously unknown chorus of "Deborah." My contemporary gave a list of selections rehearsed by Mr. Manns at a meeting of the Yorkshire contingent, Handel Festival chorus. At the head stood the following: "Let the laird's gong." — "Deborah." This puzzled me greatly, because, apart from the sudden shock of meeting a new Handelian chorus, I could not, for the life of me, imagine how a laird had found his way on to the old Hebrew stage, and taken his dinner bell with him. At last it was suggested by an acute friend that, perhaps, the printer's boy had been at his old tricks.

Apropos to that boy, my readers may be amused to learn that he has been turning the tables upon myself lately. Revenge is sweet, and I am, it seems, to be "paid out" for exposing his little tricks. Some days ago I wrote the words "our facetious kinsmen." They appeared as "our facetious kinsin." How the fiend must have chuckled when he found the Globe sarcastic at the expense of that strange coinage and of me, the reputed coiner. But this is not the greatest of his achievements. The last issue of The Musical Times contains an example of the audacity that reaches sublimity. In a paragraph exposing one of his achievements, I said that Mr. Harper Kearton was "described" as principal tenor of Westminster Abbey. Getting by some inconceivable means at the "forme," he turned "described" into "ascribed." It may be said that this was a moderate revenge. But it shows his power, and I must be careful.

I NOTE that Sir Arthur Sullivan keeps a racehorse. Chacun à son goût, of course, but for my part, as a humble admirer of Arthur Sullivan the musician, I wish he would run a few more artistic works. They would not "tail off," as his horse appears to have done.

MR. SALA had a very interesting article in the Telegraph, the other day, on "London Street Ballads of the Past." He said, speaking of affairs in 1849: "Metropolitan improvements were gradually sweeping off the streets the 'pinners up,' or small vendors of yards of songs, who were wont to affix samples of their merchandise to dead walls or the fronts of unoccupied houses." Till within the last year or two one of these harmless folk had a pitch against the dead wall in Farringdon Street, now taken down to make room for an uglier vegetable market. There the old fellow, in favourable weather, displayed his wares, and many a deal did I have with him on my way between the Daily Telegraph office and the neighbouring station. He knew the late W. A. Barrett well: "A merry sort o' gen'l'man, as often spends a shilling wi' a pore man." It was from the dead wall in Farringdon Street that I took a copy of a wonderful Masonic Hymn:—

Come all you free-masons that dwell around the globe,
That wear the badge of innocence, I mean the royal robe.
Which Noah he did wear when in the Ark he stood,
When the world was destroyed by a deluging flood.

Noah, he was virtuous in the sight of the Lord,
He loved a free-mason that kept the sacred word,
For he built the Ark and planted the first vine,
Now his soul in heaven like an angel's doth shine.

I thought I saw twelve dazzling lights, which put me in surprise,
And, gazing all around me, I heard a dismal noise,
The serpent passed by me which fell unto the ground,
With great joy and comfort the secret word I found.

Is anything in Blake's mystic poetry equal to the last stanza? Can anybody tell me where the old ballad-monger of Farringdon Street may yet be found?

THE well-wishers of THE MUSICAL TIMES will be glad to know that the entire edition of the Jubilee number was sold before the demand ceased. The fact is one upon which not only the proprietors and editor, but all who had a hand in the number are entitled to congratulate themselves.

A FUNNY story comes from Johannisberg. The announcement of a concert to be given in that town caught the eye of a Boer farmer, who straightway presented himself at the ticket-office, where the following dialogue took place:

B. F.—What's the price of a preserved seat?
Clerk (sharply).—Seven-and-sixpence.
B. F.—Ugh! Give me one.
[Ticket is handed over and money paid.
Look here! What am I to do with my feet?
Clerk (suavely).—You sit on the seat, and tuck your feet under it.
B. F.—Oh! that wont do. Look here. Can I have another preserved seat to put my feet on?
Clerk (respectfully).—Certainly, sir!
[Ticket handed over and money paid as before. Exit B. F. contentedly.

THE age of romance has not passed. A correspondent writes thus to the Elgin Courant:—

A few days ago I happened to be walking on a pathway through a wood. At a certain point an iron gate stood across the path. It was not locked, and probably it was placed there to mark the boundary between contiguous properties. I pushed the gate open, whereupon, to my great surprise, the rusty hinges gave out with absolute fidelity the first four notes of the well-known Scottish song, "O Nannie, wilt thou gang wi' me?" The notes were really musical, and so struck was I with the truth of time and tone that I shut and opened the gate three or four times in succession. Every time as it swung open it sang exactly as if these notes were played on an American organ.

The teller of this tale, presumably a Scotchman, is not without the national caution, and declines to give the whereabouts of his wonderful gate, which is a pity, because the verification of the story would supply another proof of Mother Nature's impartiality:

There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st
But in his motion like an angel sings.

The same may, perhaps, be said of gates:

But whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close us in, we cannot hear them.

I HAVE been looking through some testimonials to a young American contralto, and will allow the reader to share the gems I have extracted: "Her tones are trumpet like." "She is a female Edouard de Reszke." "She sang with security." "Miss —— sings without uncommon difficulty from A flat below the clef to B flat above." "It [her voice] is one of those large heavy-bodied contraltos which come along only occasionally. The audience applauded her as if she had just come down from the heavenly choir." Let us hope that this gifted young person will "come along" our way in due time.

HANS RICHTER tells me that he is delighted with the Birmingham Festival Chorus. He has been rehearsing several works with them lately, especially the Ninth Symphony. "When they began, 'Be embraced in love, ye millions,'" said the great conductor, "the effect was that of an avalanche. There is nothing like it on the Continent."

DR. RICHTER was so pleased with A. C. Mackenzie's "Britannia" Overture that he immediately ordered a set of parts for Vienna, where it will be performed during the next Philharmonic season. I have the honour of being with Richter in appreciation of a very bright and spontaneous work.

THE musical rivalry among American cities is healthy and sometimes entertaining. When the San Francisco Argonaut said that "outside Cincinnati, and perhaps Boston, San Francisco is the most musically appreciative city in the country," a protesting voice was raised in New York: "We would humbly suggest," said the voice, "that outside of this city there is no musical life worth mentioning. Boston, to be sure, has a prominent orchestra, which has fallen upon evil days; Chicago has Thomas, and Cincinnati has—what?—a May Festival." Dear kinsmen, go on thus pricking the sides of each other's intent. You will all arrive, by and-bye.

Here lies my wife
All my tears will not bring her back to life.
Therefore I weep.

For some time past I have neglected the gems of American musical criticism, but it is impossible to overlook one quoted by the Musical Courier from the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette:

A myriad mystic lutes, breathing low and luscious sounds, have made Cincinnati's atmosphere their local habitation to lend their unctuous aid to the carnival of song. Mingling with the lutes are voices sweeter than the thrush or the nightingale, distilling celestial melody, which floats upon the air like stardust in the ether. When battles are fought the elements are drawn, though tardily, into answering unison, and rip the deathly silence with their energies. So it would seem that the kindlier powers unseen are wooed by earthly manifestations into harmonic accord, and the May Festival is the intercessor.

Another example is cited from the Chicago Opera. The reference is to a singer, Mr. Libby:

His is a deep, rich baritone, splendidly cultivated and handled, and possessed of that unusual flexibility which admits of admirable entrée to the realm of basse-centre and the sky of finished tenora. In the chorus parts his clear notes cut through the mingling voices and proclaim his presence. But in solos his voice's unbroken melody sweeps in sweet influencing waves over the feelings, painting enravishing visions and enthralling with its own peculiar magnetism.

Now, I ask the reader, could anything be more lovely? "The realm of basse-centre, and the sky of finished tenora!" We dull Englishmen can do many things, some of them mighty foolish, as Mr. Pepys would say, but we cannot attain unto this.

I gather from Freund's Weekly that the American critics taking note of the Cincinnati Festival have improved. Says my contemporary:

Instead of jaundiced eyes seeing everything yellow—instead of Cantharidean, caustic, searching blister plasters of critical flagellators with Hercules clubs attached to their pens and a strabismus or squint in their judgment, we now find metaphysical and superoxygenated critics. Bellerophon-like springing on their quill-Pegasus, armed with a Parthian bow for defence, Thomas is greeted with encouraging words and the chorus is patted on the back.

Good. The world improves and words get longer.

It would seem that my Wagnerite friends are splitting into factions. The following is quoted from the New York Sun:

For the purpose of freshening up the Bayreuth performances, which through frequent repetitions have gradually become somewhat worn, Cosima Wagner, with her fine sense of discovering lucrative ideals, hit upon the idea of correcting "Lohengrin" historically—that is to say, substituting for the twelfth century costumes and properties, that have hitherto been used, those of the tenth century, which are historically more correct. "Lohengrin," thus changed in costuming and mise-en-scène, was to have formed a great attraction this season at Bayreuth.

Now the crafty and active Herr Possart has snatched away this idea from Frau Cosima, and with a start of two months has successfully produced in Munich this version of "Lohengrin," à la Bayreuth. The Bayreuth coterie is concocting terrible plans for revenge and for boycotting Possart and Munich.

Some dreadful person has patented a device for playing the banjo by electricity. "It requires no skill," says the description before me, and, therefore, precisely suits people who love the instrument.

Really some censorship should be set up over Bülow anecdotes. I have just read that the late eccentric disliked fat people in general, and fat artists in particular. "A concert-singer in Hanover, of large dimensions, was present at a supper when Bülow arose and proposed a toast for 'die prima tonna' (barrel) instead of the prima donna." Bülow did many foolish things, but never one so unpardonable as that. I say this, of course, on the assumption of his sanity.

Here is another story:

At one of the Meiningen public rehearsals, the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven had been performed in the presence of the Duke of Meiningen and a full house. The Duke was greatly pleased with the performance, especially with the singing of the chorus of ladies, and he requested Bülow to speak a few words of praise to them. The wicked Hans stepped to the conductor's desk, rapped for attention, and turning to the chorus said, in the presence of the entire audience, "Ladies, I assure you, you sang abominably."

The ladies should have asserted the superiority of their sex and ducked him in the nearest horse-pond. I say this, of course, on the assumption that the tale is true.

HANDEL FESTIVAL.—REHEARSAL.

As we go to press the audience of "The Messiah" are wending homewards from the performance of that masterwork, and all we can do in our present issue, with regard to the great triennial gathering at the Crystal Palace, is to notice the general rehearsal, which took place on Friday, the 22nd ult., in presence of more than 15,000 people. It will be taken for granted that both orchestra and chorus were of the usual dimensions and quality. In these respects years bring little change. We have met with some rather rash attempts at comparing the present executive resources with those which Sir Michael Costa controlled, to the disadvantage of the last-named! Our recollection of the battalions of singers and players commanded by the Neapolitan musician is perfectly clear, and we say without hesitation that those under Mr. Manns are neither better nor worse. On the one hand, there is no proof of progress; on the other, no evidence of retrogression. We did very well in 1864, we are doing very well in 1894. That should suffice; especially as, neither thirty years ago nor now, could any country in the world achieve an equal success. As on previous occasions, London sends a very heavy contingent to the choral and instrumental force, but the provinces are still so far represented as to give a national character to the whole. This is well; it would be better if the metropolis were not drawn upon quite so liberally. The question is one of cost, and we are not entitled to dispute the judgment of the directors. Nevertheless, a "counsel of perfection" would urge the engagement of fresh and strong country voices in as large a proportion as circumstances make possible. The orchestra, over 500 in number, is this time deprived—so we hear—of many excellent performers owing to the action of Sir Augustus Harris, who would not permit his "merry men" to take temporary service under Mr. Manns. We regret the absence of such able artists, but it would be unfair to blame their manager, the exigencies of whose busy season are imperative, and, necessarily, a first charge upon those in his employment. But, as a matter of fact, the orchestral resources at the command of the Crystal Palace Company on these occasions are inexhaustible. There was absolutely no difficulty in getting together a sufficiency of capable players, nor would there have been had the required number reached to double the actual figures.

The general arrangements at the Palace, so far as concerned the rehearsal, were those which have been long in force—those which experience has shown to work most smoothly towards the desired end. It may be imagined, therefore, how easily the thousands on the orchestra, and the many more thousands in the transept, were controlled, or, perhaps, we should say, controlled themselves. Everything passed off without a hitch, and in the most successful manner; the occasion being, in short, one of good augury for the days of actual performance, and for a result creditable to all concerned. In drawing up his programme,

Mr. Manns was bound by the fact that not so much the audience as the requirements of a rehearsal were the first consideration. Hence he took from "The Messiah" only the "Hallelujah" and "Amen," by way of an effective opening, devoting the remainder of the day to the less familiar works in the Selection and some of the great choruses in "Israel." Several of the Selection numbers, as it turned out, needed a good deal of preparation, from which Mr. Manns did not shrink. His predecessor was less scrupulous, and, though an autocrat to the tips of his fingers, sacrificed his perception of defects rather than mar the pleasure of the public. Mr. Manns simply ignored the public, as was both his duty and his right. He amused them also. The great company found themselves behind the scenes, assisting at a process more or less new and mysterious to the majority, and at every stoppage for corrections great was the entertainment given by the Conductor's energetic explanations or by the little vocal solos which added example to precept. The audience saw, moreover, how quickly an intelligent musical host profits by instruction and how great a change a few words of advice can effect. As a result of so much care, the success of the performances proper seemed to be assured more absolutely than ever before. It is needless to state in detail what was done, especially as criticism would be out of place. Enough that particular attention was paid to the works not previously heard at these Festivals, that all the selections for orchestra alone were gone through and passed with very little trouble, and that solos were sung by Miss Ella Russell, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Samuell, Madame Mackenzie, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Black, and Mr. Salmond. Very admirably did the artists acquit themselves, but their efforts could not abate the profound impression made by the gigantic chorus and orchestra. In the ensemble of these great bodies lies the raison d'être and the distinction of the Handel Festivals, We can hear the soloists frequently; the overwhelming voices and instruments speak but once in three years. And to what purpose? Ask the dullest in the rehearsal audience how he felt as the "Hailstone" Chorus raged, with thunders rivalling those of heaven. No doubt it will be our duty to record, next month, an impressive and successful Festival.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

So far the interest of the present season has been fairly divided between the operas performed and those who take part in their representation, this equality arising from the very spirited manner in which Sir Augustus Harris has put forward one new work after another. Last month we had to speak of "Manon" and "Falstaff," and now it is our duty to record the first performance of Massenet's "Werther" and "La Navarraise." We enter upon the task without further preliminary.

"Werther," libretto by MM. Blau, Milliet, and Hartmann, is an example of the domestic opera against which Richard Wagner, when he had the myth on his mind, planted the batteries of his rhetoric. It deals, as those who have read Goethe will assume, with the fortunes, or, rather, the misfortunes of a lover without strength enough to keep aloof from another man's wife, and of a wife who, beneath a bread-and-butter-cutting conventionality, had firmness enough to keep herself void of criminal offence. The only way out of the imbroglio—at least, so thinks the lover—is through the gate of suicide, and that road he takes. Often it seems that the most terrible tragedies are those of domestic life, and here is a case in point. But we need not enlarge upon the story of Werther and Charlotte in this reading age. It has, for not a few years, appealed, through Goethe's pages, to men and women of sensibility, and though now considered mawkish, perhaps, receives the attention due to a classic. The version prepared for operatic use by the three librettists named above suffers, some may think, from the fact that all the characters, the lovers excepted, are little better than lay figures put on to fill up the scene. Charlotte's lively young sister, Sophie, is but a foil; the Bailli appears as a commonplace house-father, highly respectable, no doubt, but not in the same degree interesting; his two friends, Johann and Schmidt, are typical and, doubtless, copious beer-drinkers, such as are plentifully made in Germany; while Albert, the husband of Charlotte, takes a somewhat mechanical and only at one moment impressive part in the play. But the nonentity, actual or comparative, of these personages serves to put Charlotte and Werther into high relief. Attention is never distracted from them and, in a certain dramatic sense, they work out their destiny alone. Human nature reigns supreme in these characters, who, indeed, show us human nature in its frankest manifestation. The charm of the story lies greatly in thorough intelligibleness. We understand why Werther falls in love with Charlotte, and why she, though formally, and as a matter of family arrangement, engaged to another, takes the interest in him which gives birth to love. We can feel with Werther in his bitter trial, and with Charlotte when, at a critical moment, she starts back in terror from the brink of unfaithfulness. Not being desperately smitten with Charlotte ourselves, Werther's suicide may seem rather too violent a measure; but the master-passion can be stronger than the fear of death, and many a Pyramus has died for "Thisbe dear." If, therefore, the story of Werther lacks "sensation," save in its catastrophe, it has at any rate the interest of humanity which appeals to human beings.

Mr. Massenet, whose form in this work is that common to modern French opera, appears most winningly in his recognised character as a melodist, and, moreover, as one who treats his themes with entire frankness. Some of the principal subjects recur, but they are not Leitmotiven in the Wagnerian sense, nor do they undergo more than slight modifications while under treatment. For the rest, and save in moments of melodramatic intensity, we have in "Werther" a succession of interesting and often beautiful melodies, grateful to the ear and at the same time expressive of the sentiment from which the music purports to spring. The book gave the composer no opportunity for the production of choral effects, yet as the opera proceeds we are not conscious of lacking them. As a matter of fact, the orchestra commands sustained attention by the variety of its effects and the masterful adaptation of its music to the emotions and situations of the stage. Mr. Massenet is, in this respect, eminently qualified. He seems to have an instinctive perception of the right thing to do, and his resources never fail him. That the music is French in style and expression goes without saying and needs no apology. Mr. Massenet is a Frenchman, who to characteristic refinement and grace adds strength enough for any stage requirement. Take the great duet of Charlotte and Werther in the third act, which determines the fate of the distracted and desperate lover. Here there is power if anything more than sufficient. We feel in the grasp of a strong hand, although in many parts of the work the sensation is as that of a velvet glove. It should be added that some charming light music relieves the more serious strains in the first three acts, and serves admirably for effects of contrast. "Werther" was put upon the stage in an economical fashion, the manager being doubtful, apparently, whether the public would take to it. The performance, however, gave much satisfaction, more especially that part of it for which Mr. Jean de Reszke was responsible. Finer singing and acting than that of the Polish tenor rarely commands the praise of critics. Miss Eames was fairly successful as Charlotte and rose to an unexpected height in the duet above-mentioned. The subordinate parts were generally in good hands. It should be mentioned that the date of the production was the 12th ult.

"La Navarraise," the second novelty of the month (produced on the 20th ult.), need not detain us so long as "Werther." It plays under the hour, is practically a one-act piece, and belongs to the class of works in which intense dramatic excitement takes precedence of musical interest. MM. Clarétie and Cain's story, carried on amid scenes of war, and having as its main motive the desperate love of a woman who, to win her husband, does not stop short of murder, is one of the strongest, if not absolutely the most powerful of its class, and is told with immense concentration. Rapid action is a necessity of such pieces. Events must hurry on breathlessly, the composer not daring to arrest their march for any separate consideration of his art.

Massenet has recognised his obligation in "La Navarraise." One or two situations only are musically prolonged, and advantage is taken of a night bivouac for a song with chorus; also for an orchestral nocturne. Elsewhere the musician is chained to the wheel of the rapid drama, and hurries along with it, doing his best with transient themes and instrumental colour. In a musical sense, therefore, "La Navarraise" can hardly be considered important. But as a compound of drama and music, the piece is very strong. It certainly held the Covent Garden audience as in a grip of iron. We never saw a house so absorbed in the fortunes of the stage, and seldom have witnessed a success so thorough and instantaneous. Something of this was manifestly due to the exertions of Madame Calvé and Mr. Alvarez, by whom the principal characters were represented. These artists are fine actors, and met easily the requirements of scenes that called for great tragic power. The piece was admirably staged and the many supernumeraries had been well drilled; so that the representation enjoyed assistance from quarters whence help is not always forthcoming. "La Navarraise" seems sure of a long run.

Concerning the more familiar doings of the month, we need not be precise. Enough that various popular operas, such as "Faust," "Roméo et Juliette," and "Lohengrin" have met with customary favour, and that Madame Melba has so taken her part in some of them as to show marked improvement. Her singing now almost deserves to be called great, and it is significant that she has played such works as "Lucia" and "Rigoletto" to crowded houses. Great is still the power of an accomplished prima donna.

GERMAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

It has been truly said that opera in German at present means chiefly Wagnerian music-drama. Italy and France have entered upon a fresh stage of their operatic history, but so far as regards production all is barren from Dan to Beersheba in the Fatherland. Sir Augustus Harris was forced to recognise this when he announced eight performances in the Teutonic language, for six of them are devoted to the Bayreuth master, the remaining two being revivals of those neglected masterpieces "Fidelio" and "Der Freischütz." The series was hastily arranged, but subscriptions at once flowed in, showing the present popularity of Wagner's works. We can only at present notice the first and second representations, which consisted of the two favourite sections of the colossal tetralogy "The Nibelung's Ring"—namely, "Die Walküre" and "Siegfried." The first of these took place on Tuesday, the 19th ult., and the second on the following Saturday. There is no longer any occasion to say a word concerning the merits of these wonderful creations. The exquisitely poetic ideas, especially in "Siegfried," the flow of lovely melody, separated, it must be allowed, by some dull pages, and the truly marvellous scoring are now fully admitted by all impartial critics. In Mr. Alvary and Mrs. Klafsky the impresario has secured perhaps the two finest artists in the world for this class of work. Mr. Alvary is not a finished vocalist, but in every other respect he is inimitable; and Mrs. Klafsky unites to the charms of face and manner a lovely vocal organ. The fact that in Wagner's music-dramas all the arts are supposed to be united is fully recognised by this splendid pair. their posing, say, in the great love duet in the third act of "Siegfried" being exceedingly beautiful. The eye as well as the ear was delighted, and this is, of course, as it should be. Of the other performers not one was superior to our compatriot, Mr. David Bispham, who, as Hunding in the earlier work and Alberich in the later, showed the utmost intelligence. Miss Gherlsen's voice is scarcely powerful enough for the trying music of Sieglinde, but her girlish appearance suits the part; Miss Olitzka as Fricka and Erda was excellent, and Mr. Wiegand was sufficiently rugged and ponderous as Wotan. Evidence of care was noticeable in the scenic arrangements, and Mr. Lohse, whose orchestra was rather rough, at once proved himself an able Conductor.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

Since our last notice of these Concerts, two performances have been given, and the season has come to an end with, we rejoice to hear, most successful pecuniary results. Times have changed from what they were now that the "old Philharmonic" winds up two seasons in succession with a handsome balance on the right side.

The sixth Concert (7th ult.) was largely devoted to the greater glory of Mr. Saint-Saëns, who attended in person and conducted a performance of his Symphony in C minor for orchestra, organ, and pianoforte, and of his Violin Concerto in B minor. The first-named work had had a previous hearing under the same auspices, but not with results which absolutely warranted a repetition. It is a composition, in our view, of greater pretence than achievement, although so clever and resourceful a musician as Mr. Saint-Saëns could not fail to make much of it interesting. Further acquaintance did not alter the opinions we expressed in 1886, but rather confirmed a belief that there is little virtue in an accumulation of executive means. As Wagner said of Berlioz, Mr. Saint-Saëns appeared to be overwhelmed by his own machines. The Violin Concerto is a very different work in character and calibre. Skilfully played, as to its solo, by Miss Frida Scotta, it was heard with manifest approval and pleasure. The Concerto has claims to rank among the best of its class in virtue of tunefulness and masterly construction, while the slow movement is a gem of simple loveliness. Recognising this the audience were not slow to compliment the composer-conductor, whom, indeed, they overwhelmed with applause. Other works in the sixth programme were Wagner's "Eine Faust Overture," ably played under Dr. Mackenzie; Sullivan's "Overtura di Ballo," and Beethoven's "Adelaide," fervently sung by Mr. Ben Davies.

The closing Concert, on the 21st ult., was distinguished by a performance of Dvorák's new Symphony, "From the New World"—a work avowedly based upon American themes, though cast in classic mould, and no less avowedly intended as a suggestion towards the formation of a national American style. We cannot see how the great Anglo-Saxon republic can be expected to adopt negro and Indian tunes as national melodies, but that is hardly a question for us to consider. The Symphony appeals to us as music simply, and we must, first of all, acknowledge that the Bohemian master has treated his homely materials with great success. It does not appear that the themes are actually borrowed from the sources above-named, but they have the form and spirit of plantation melodies and, in certain cases, a very close resemblance to them. The subjects are treated with immense spirit and ingenuity, while in the slow movement—an "impression" of Hiawatha's Wooing—there is much tender feeling and all the beauty that should go with it. Ably played under Dr. Mackenzie's direction, the Symphony met with favour, and will doubtless be heard again on an early occasion. The Conductor's spontaneous and humorous Overture, "Britannia," was another success. Its merits, obvious enough when presented at the Royal Academy Concert, were set out on this occasion in a still clearer light. It is a wonderfully clever work, and deserves all the encomiums lavished upon it the other day, in our hearing, by no less a judge than Hans Richter. Mr. César Thompson can hardly be congratulated upon his performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto. The season and the Concert closed with the Overture to "Der Freischütz," substituted for Ferroni's "Ariosto," the MS. parts of which were found illegible.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

These admirable Concerts were resumed on the 4th ult., much to the pleasure of a large section of metropolitan amateurs, who look forward to the arrival of Herr Richter with an anticipation made keen by the memory of many pleasant hours. Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Wagner's "Meistersinger" and "Parsifal" Preludes, and Brahms's wonderful Variations for orchestra on a theme of Haydn's—"Chorale St. Antonii"—have figured so often in Richter programmes that no description of the manner of their performance need now detain us. Enough that the magnificent qualities of interpretation that have so often called for and received acknowledgment remain untarnished even by the corrupting influences of familiarity. Besides these familiar works, however, there was a novelty—Smetana's Symphonic Poem "Vysehrad." This work, the first of a cycle of orchestral pieces entitled "Mein Vaterland," is in three sections, respectively depicting the splendour, decline, and fallen state of the castle whose name it bears. The music of each is picturesque and interesting, and never exceeds the limits within which music by itself may be legitimately used to illustrate a succession of events. Only the general character of these events is depicted, and, in consequence, "Vysehrad" does successfully what many more ambitious attempts fail to achieve. At the second Concert, on the 11th ult., the pièce de resistance was that stupendous work, Schubert's Symphony in C, of which an exceedingly fine performance was given. There were also Bizet's "Arlesienne" Suite (No. 1), the great "Leonora" Overture of Beethoven, Berlioz's Overture to "Le Carnaval Romain," and vocal pieces from "Die Meistersinger," to which Mr. Edward Lloyd lent the charm of his matchless voice and style. The third Concert opened with Dvorák's "Carnaval" Overture (second of the set of three recently composed) and included the "Verwandlungs-Musik" and "Graal-Feier" from "Parsifal," the D minor Symphony of Schumann, the familiar selection from "Der Ring des Nibelungen," and Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, the solo part of which was played with perfect intellectual and technical mastery by the youth who, but a few short years ago, we spoke of as "little Joseph Hofmann." To-day, even, he is "big" only in an artistic sense, but in this respect so unmistakably so that the audience called him four times to the platform and were only silenced by an additional bonne bouche. The fourth Concert, which took place on the 25th ult., stands over for notice till our next issue.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THE Students' Chamber Concert of the Royal Academy of Music, held in St. James's Hall, on Monday, the 4th ult., was, on the whole, successful. An excellent performance was secured of Grieg's Quartet in G minor by Messrs. G. Walenn, W. H. Reed, A. Walenn, and B. P. Parker; and Mr. M. Donnawell displayed much facility as a flautist in a Suite by B. Godard (Op. 116). Of the pianists, Miss Gertrude Peppercorn was among the most successful in the Giga con Variazioni from Raff's Suite in D minor.

The competition for the Parepa-Rosa Gold Medal took place on the 16th ult. The examiners were Mesdames Marian McKenzie, Charlotte Thudichum, and Anne Mudie Bolingbroke (in the chair). The prize was awarded to Gertrude Bevan, and the examiners highly commended Ada Kempton.

The competition for the Leslie Crotty Prize took place on the 18th ult. The examiners were Messrs. Andrew Black, H. Plunket Greene, and W. H. Brereton (in the chair). The prize was awarded to T. Mewrig James, and the examiners highly commended David Jones.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC LECTURES.

MR. F. CORDER concluded, on the 6th ult., at the Royal Academy, his instructive and comprehensive history of the "Musical treatment of the Faust Legend." The lecturer devoted considerable time to Schumann's setting of "Scenes from Goethe's Faust," that portion referring to Faust's salvation being described as "one of the most poetical things in all music," and as this composer's masterpiece. Of course attention was called to the fact, sometimes overlooked, that whereas the concluding portions of the poem were penned between 1843 and 1848, Schumann's brightest and best period, the first two parts show unmistakable traces of the mental decadence which clouded his later years. The interest of these remarks was heightened by the duet from the "garden scene," admirably sung by two students, Miss Sylvia Wardell and Mr. Arthur Walenn. Mr. Henry Hugh Pierson's "Music to the second part of Goethe's Faust" was next reviewed. This composer is, perhaps, the least known in his own country, partly owing to his having migrated to Germany, where he married and died, and partly from the extravagant and incoherent style of his music. Phrases appear and disappear, have no counterpart or continuation, and the rhythm and tune are frequently changed without apparent object. Similar complaints had, the lecturer said, been made concerning Wagner, and, indeed, every master of his art; but Wagner was never obscure, although he was sometimes difficult to understand owing to the extreme chromatic nature of the harmonies. Perhaps the best number in Pierson's "Faust" music is the "Song of the Warder," and this was very effectively sung by another student, Mr. Ranalow. After brief references to the "Faust" overtures by Wagner and Rubinstein; the opera by Louise Angélique Bertin, which consists of a series of conventional Italian cantabile strains in the style of Bellini; an opéra comique by the Baron de Pellaert; and settings of the lyrics by Lenz, Schubert, and Liszt, some admirable comments were made on the last-named composer's "Faust Symphony," which was described as his most characteristic and original work. The lecturer cogently remarked concerning Liszt's peculiar method of composition—viz., the taking a few phrases and submitting them to various harmonic and rhythmic metamorphoses—that although this system was somewhat artificial, it was, when adopted on a grand scale, productive of imposing effects, especially when pursued by such a master of instrumentation as Liszt. Where he failed, however, was in the development of the themes, which never seemed to evolve fresh material, but were simply repeated. Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust" was submitted to severe but impartial criticism. Its artificial and bombastic elements were shown, as well as the apparently constant striving after new and startling orchestral effects. The "Rakoczy March" had nothing whatever to do with the subject, the "Amen" chorus was "an uncommonly bad fugue," while of all the settings of "Faust" there was not one in which the grand old story had been so shamefully ill-treated. Signor Arrigo Boïto's opera "Mefistofele" did not fare much better at the lecturer's hands, being described as a curious compound of crudity, cleverness, vulgarity, and poetry. No one unacquainted with the whole of Goethe's play could make head or tail of the libretto. The opening prelude suggested a burlesque of Wagner, the "Kermesse" music was vulgar, and Marguerite's opening lines in the "garden scene" were set to a melody of Offenbach's. The best libretto for its purpose was declared to be undoubtedly that of Gounod's "Faust." There was no need to dwell on this music beyond paying a tribute of praise to the remarkable strength and beauty of its melodic material. The lecturer concluded by describing the incidental music to the first and second parts of Goethe's "Faust," written by Edouard Lassen, which, in spite of its occasional slips into the commonplace, was shown to be, as a whole, the most complete and satisfactory incidental music yet provided for the drama.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

AT the 184th Students' Concert, on May 31, Schumann's Trio in F received a somewhat too spirited interpretation at the hands of Messrs. E. Howard Jones, W. Ackroyd, and Tennyson Werge, the second-named young gentleman being also heard in the difficult Romance from Joachim's Hungarian Concerto. A refined and finished performance was given of Mozart's G minor String Quintet. The divine Adagio in this lovely work was played with much feeling, Miss Ruth Howell distinguishing herself greatly as leader. Mr. N. McLeod Jones sang an air by Donizetti with fair success, and Miss Ena Bedford essayed Ambroise Thomas's "Connais tu," from "Mignon."

The most noteworthy piece in the programme of the Concert on the 7th ult. was César Franck's little-known Pianoforte and Violin Sonata in A, a work offering some peculiarities of form and treatment which hardly recommend themselves on a first hearing; but so full of seriousness, dignity, and musicianly skill that it commands respect, if not sympathy, and certainly deserves further acquaintance. The performance, by Miss Marie Motto (violin) and Miss Maud Branwell (pianoforte), was exceedingly good, the former producing a remarkably fine tone from her instrument. The performances of Beethoven's Quartet for strings in F minor (Op. 95) and of Schubert's Pianoforte Trio in B flat (Op. 99) were highly praiseworthy, particularly the latter; and in songs by Spohr and Goring Thomas, Miss Dora Barrington and Miss Ruby Shaw displayed pleasing voices, the effect of which would be much enhanced by more distinct and careful enunciation.

We have never attended a better Concert at the College than that of the 22nd ult., when the students played Tschaikowsky's last Symphony. The performance was a surprise, but that Professor Stanford's young people succeeded as well as they did in giving expression to the pathos of the first and last movements is, perhaps, more surprising than that they should have played the stupendous Scherzo (in spite of its power, pomp, and brilliancy, perhaps the least elevated part of the work) so as to create a veritable furore. Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony and the Finale to Act III. of "Don Giovanni," both excellently rendered, completed the programme.

PIANOFORTE AND VIOLIN RECITALS.

Performances of this nature have been given in such numbers of late that it is impossible to deal with them except with the utmost brevity. The first to be mentioned is the Pianoforte Recital of Madame Roger-Miclos, at the Princes' Hall, on May 26, when she was assisted by Mr. Johannes Wolff. She was less successful in works which may be regarded as classical than in pieces in the more showy style of Moszkowski and Godard.

On the same afternoon Mr. Nachèz gave his second Concert at St. James's Hall, when he played with considerable effect Max Bruch's Concerto in G minor (No. 1), with pianoforte accompaniment; Dr. Mackenzie's expressive "Benedictus"; and three movements from Dr. Hubert Parry's Bach-like Partita in D minor. Mr. Oudin's selection of songs was judicious, and included a new composition, "Réponse," nicely written by the Concert-giver.

There were also two Recitals on the following Monday. Miss Kleeberg, who is always welcome, performed at St. James's Hall, and displayed her refined and expressive style as well as her perfect technique in Beethoven's late Sonata in E (Op. 109), Bach's "Italian" Concerto, and minor pieces by Schubert, Schumann, Chopin, and Brahms. Of a Suite, entitled "Poëmes Sylvestres," by Theodore Dubois, it is impossible to speak in enthusiastic terms. Songs were contributed by the German light tenor, Mr. R. Kaufmann.

The Recital of Mr. Raoul Pugno, at the Princes' Hall, was well attended, and this artist, who is decidedly above the average of pianists, should visit us again at a less busy time of year. On this occasion he displayed executive capacity and intelligence of no ordinary kind in Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata and Schumann's picturesque "Faschingsschwank aus Wien," and received able assistance from Mr. Hollman in Grieg's Sonata in A minor for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 36).

On the evening of the same day Master Arthur Argiewicz, the youthful violinist, gave his first Concert at the Princes' Hall. His most important effort was in Max Bruch's Concerto in G minor (No. 1), and in this as well as in minor compositions he certainly evinced talents which are worthy of serious cultivation. It is, therefore, satisfactory to learn that his natural protectors have resolved to remove him temporarily from public life and place him under the tuition of Dr. Joachim, with whom his gifts may be expected to develop in a legitimate manner.

Passing over some Recitals of small interest which occurred in the same week, we come to that of Miss Chaminade, on Saturday, the 2nd ult., at St. James's Hall. The talented young French composer and pianist presented a number of her own compositions, vocal and instrumental, those of unpretentious character being the more pleasing. The songs contributed by Miss Landi and Mr. Arthur Oswald all proved charming, especially "Si j'étais jardinier," "L'Anneau d'argent," and "Auprès de ma mie." Miss Liza Lehmann and Mr. Stojowski took effective part in the performance.

On the same afternoon that clever pianist, M. Slivinski, gave a Recital at the Queen's Hall, but for some reason unexplained he was nearly half-an-hour late in commencing. The audience bore the delay with fairly good humour, but it ought not to have occurred. With one exception—Mozart's Fantasia in C minor—only compositions of small calibre were given, the Polish pianist being most successful in compositions by his compatriot, Chopin. The show pieces with which pianists think it necessary to conclude their Recitals were, however, rendered with much brilliancy.

Mr. Pugno gave a second Recital on the 4th ult., and on the 9th Mr. Josef Hofmann gave his last for the present. He was scarcely in his best form, playing Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor in a flurried manner and taking the Funeral March at a strangely rapid pace. Some smaller pieces, notably Liszt's Rhapsodie Espagnole, served however to display the youthful executant's executive capacity to the best advantage.

St. James's Hall was well filled on the following Monday, when Madame Sophie Menter gave a Recital and played with splendid effect Chopin's Sonata in B minor (Op. 58), and minor pieces by Beethoven, Schumann, Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky, and her pupil, Mr. Sapellnikoff. Some disarrangements of Schubert and Wagner were mercifully placed at the end of the programme.

The Pianoforte Recital of Mr. Isidor Cohn, on Wednesday, the 13th ult., was rendered interesting by the first performance of a new Pianoforte Trio in E minor, by Dvorák (Op. 90). This bears the title of "Dumky," and is a singularly fresh and beautiful work, full of the Bohemian composer's most characteristic touches. Details may be reserved, for the Trio is certain to be heard again next season. The able pianist received efficient assistance from Lady Hallé, Mr. Whitehouse, Miss Lydia Müller, Mr. Ries, and Mr. Gibson.

Master Argiewicz, on the 14th, and Mr. Slivinski, on the 16th ult., gave second Recitals, and on the afternoon of the last-named day Mr. Tivadar Nachèz gave another Violin Recital, at which he played the first movement of Beethoven's Concerto, the two Romances in G (Op. 40) and in F (Op. 50), and a graceful Romance in D, by Mr. Arthur Hervey.

ANCIENT GREEK MUSIC.

On Monday, the 25th ult., Mr. W. H. Wing and Mr. Abdy Williams gave the first vocal performance in London of the Delphian Hymn, at the Queen's Hall (small room). Mr. Williams also gave a short account of Greek and Roman music. Speaking of the importance of the discovery, he said Greek writers were so unanimous in praise of their music that the keenest curiosity had always been felt to hear something of this art, and the opportunity had now come. Music played a more important rôle with the Greeks than with us. It was considered the best means of training the intellect and strengthening the character, as gymnastics trained the body, and for this reason was taught to boys. Plato considered that no one could be really musical who did not know how to be virtuous, temperate, and courageous. To the Greek, music, like all the other arts, was an expression of the mind, and not merely an enjoyable amusement, or an ornamental adjunct to religious exercises. The lecturer then spoke of the musical contests at the sacred games, in which lyric poets contended for prizes; for the profession of lyric poet demanded first-rate skill, not only in poetry, but in music, dancing, and chorus training. He gave an account of the supposed music to a portion of Pindar's first Pythian Ode, showing some of the arguments for, and against, the probability of its being genuine.

Mr. Wing having sung this music, Mr. Williams, after mentioning that Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides were musical composers, proceeded to give reasons drawn from history why their music had not come down to us. Thus, when their dramas were no longer performed in public in the theatre, the scribes employed to produce copies of them would, in all probability, reproduce excellent copies of the text, which could always be appreciated; but would gradually cease to copy a number of musical signs which were not likely ever to be required again. The Hymn to Apollo had come to us in its original form, on stone, so that there were no mistakes through the carelessness or ignorance of scribes; and this made the discovery all the more valuable. The lecturer then proceeded to give reasons why M. Reinach's interpretation of the music was the best that could be made, and was, in all probability, absolutely exact. The hymn was originally accompanied by flutes and lyres. Such a band was represented on the North frieze of the Parthenon, where a group of two lyre players and one performer on the double flute precede the bearers of olive branches. The rhythm of five beats in a bar soon became acceptable to modern ears—witness the second movement of Tschaikowsky's last Symphony. Fourteen fragments in all were found with musical notation, only two of which were large enough to contain sufficient of the music to allow of reproduction. Mr. Wing sang these two portions separately, first in Greek and then in English. The second portion is the best preserved; it contains some very difficult passages for the voice, which Mr. Wing sang with excellent effect. Mr. Williams pointed out some melodic passages which recurred more than once, which had suggested the idea of Wagner's Leitmotiv; but the lecturer thought this rather far-fetched.

This ended the most important part of the performance. During the remainder of the Lecture, excellent renderings were given by Mr. Wing of a short piece of music dating from about 100 A.D., found engraved on stone at Tralles, and the three well-known Hymns to Calliope, Helios, and Nemesis, of about 130 A.D.

The lecturer gave a slight sketch of the condition of music at Rome, where it was looked upon with contempt as an effeminate occupation, unfit for a nation of soldiers. When, however, it became fashionable, the Emperors affected a love of it, and several of them, especially Nero, appeared in the theatres, as public singers and dancers and instrumentalists.

The lecturer referred to the defection of the Roman flute-players in 309 B.C. as the first strike on record. The musicians of Rome were formed into colleges of flute-players, trumpeters, singers, &c., each college having a common chest and certain privileges as a corporate body. A burial ground, dating from 30 B.C., of the college of the singers who performed in the public games, is still in existence near the Latin Gate in Rome. Under the Empire, Greek musicians were imported to Rome as slaves to minister to the pleasures of the people, and the three hymns mentioned above were probably written by two Greeks, one of whom was a freedman (i.e., a liberated slave) of Hadrian.

FOREIGN VOCAL SOCIETIES IN LONDON.

Not the least interesting feature of the musical season has been the brief visits to the metropolis of choirs from foreign countries not often sending representatives to these shores. After the Amsterdam Choir came choral bodies from Switzerland and Sweden. Each contingent had something novel to offer, so that curiosity attached to their proceedings independently of questions of executive efficiency. The Berner Liedertafel, a male-voice choir numbering 120, under the conductorship of Dr. Carl Munzinger, director of the Berne Conservatoire, appeared at the Queen's Hall, on May 28, with a programme mainly consisting of folk-songs, patriotic ditties, and ballads. The chief piece was a setting by Dr. Munzinger of Uhland's "Harald," sung by the choir with considerable impulse. The volume of tone produced was good, and the choristers went through their duties with notable precision. Max Bruch's chorus "Vom Rhein" and some bright part-songs were well received by an audience not inclined to be very critical respecting the artistic value of the compositions given. Frau E. Raüber-Sandoz contributed in a pleasing manner Gluck's "O del mio dolce ardor" and songs by Franz and Schumann, and assistance was given by other soloists. Herr Max Reichel successfully played some violin pieces.

Sixty-six Swedish singers were heard at Queen's Hall, on the 5th ult. They were headed by the Hon. Axel Taube, and their selection of pieces was mostly of a national type. Their rendering of these had sufficient animation, though there were few manifestations of the superior qualities of choral singing. The most pleasing element of the Concert was the finished solo singing of Mdlle. Agnes Janson. On the whole, the performances of both the Swiss and the Swedish visitors failed to create the impression that they were able to teach much to British choralists.

PETERBOROUGH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The fifth of the Peterborough and Lincoln Musical Festivals took place in Peterborough Cathedral on the 14th ult. The fine Norman nave at Peterborough is admirably adapted, both acoustically and æsthetically, for the purposes of a musical festival, since, without the confusing effect of echo, there is sufficient reverberation to give an added charm to music. A change of some importance was effected in building the temporary orchestra, not under the West window, as at the last Festival, but against the newly-erected choir gates, and close to the fine organ recently presented to the Cathedral, whose oak case, bracketed out from the triforium, forms a striking addition to the restored interior. It was probably in order that the new organ might be used that the alteration was made, and it must be said that Messrs. Hills' instrument, played with commendable discretion as it was by Mr. C. Hancock, had an excellent effect in the ensemble. The afternoon service opened, after the recitation of sundry collects and versicles, with a setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C, by Dr. Haydn Keeton, the Organist of the Cathedral and Conductor of the Festival. While both Canticles were obviously the work of a thoroughly competent musician, the latter possessed, perhaps, a greater share of distinction, some passages for the orchestra, and the effective treatment of the Gloria, deserving especial praise. Next came Beethoven's second Symphony. It is now pretty generally accepted that all great and serious compositions, if devoid of secular associations, are fit for the House of God, so that it is hardly necessary to insist upon the perfect appropriateness of Beethoven's music on this occasion. Even the Scherzo, and the unbridled imagination of the Finale, seemed absolutely in place, while, from a purely æsthetic point of view, the dignity of the building and the welcome absence of applause greatly enhanced the charm of the music. The performance was a correct one, erring, if at all, on the side of decorum. It was followed by "Judas Maccabæus," lightened by numerous cuts to suit an age of one-act operas and half-programme oratorios. Miss Anna Williams was the principal soprano, and invested her great solo, "From mighty kings," with admirable dignity and refinement. Madame Marian McKenzie performed her comparatively unimportant rôle as contralto soloist in a thoroughly artistic style. The tenor, Mr. Bernard Lane, was less at home in Handel's music than he proved to be later on in Mendelssohn's, and was hardly able to do complete justice to the very martial air "Sound an alarm." Mr. Daniel Price was excellent in the bass solos, and sang the air "The Lord worketh wonders" with all the technical ability its quaint "divisions" demand. The second soprano part was taken by Mrs. John Stott fairly efficiently. The chorus was thoroughly competent, well-taught, ready in attack, and sufficiently powerful, save, perhaps, as regards the altos. The tenors, too, possessed more of the genuine tenor quality than is usually met with in a chorus. The singers came from various towns in the Eastern and Midland counties. The Peterborough and Lincoln Cathedral choirs furnished, of course, the nucleus, which was strengthened by contingents from the choral societies of both cities, and of Northampton, Leicester, Market Harborough, Kettering, Stamford, &c. There was a large congregation in the afternoon, but the Cathedral seemed even more crowded in the evening, when the most popular of oratorios, Mendelssohn's "Elijah," was given. The performance, in which the same soloists appeared, together with sundry local artists in the double quartet, was of all-round excellence. The band might have been larger with advantage, the strings being decidedly weak in places, but this was the chief drawback to a thoroughly creditable performance. Of the soloists it need only be said that Miss Anna Williams was at her best, that Madame Mackenzie achieved a decided popular success in the favourite air "O rest in the Lord," that Mr. Lane was far more at home in "If with all your hearts" than in anything in Handel's Oratorio, and that Mr. Price's impersonation of the Prophet was thoughtful and dramatic. At the close of each service was sung the hymn "O worship the King," set to a very clever and effective arrangement of the good old tune, "Hanover," prepared by Dr. Keeton. Such a strong, masculine tune affords a pleasant relief after the effeminate and sentimental hymns that are too common now-a days.

"THE MESSIAH" AT CAMBRIDGE.

THE saying that "familiarity breeds contempt" applies to many things, and among them to music. From the perfunctory treatment "The Messiah" constantly meets with at the hands of conductors and other executive musicians who ought to know better, it would almost seem that Handel's greatest Oratorio is a case in point. The state of the band parts in ordinary use at the present day is anything but creditable. Upon them many successive generations of conductors have wreaked their will, until the orchestral accompaniments we are accustomed to hear are neither Handel nor Mozart, but an unhappy jumble of Handel, Mozart, and tradition. We want a "Messiah" revival badly. A step in the right direction has recently been taken by a musician admirably qualified for the purpose. Dr. Mann, the Organist of King's College, Cambridge, is a Handelian enthusiast whose enthusiasm is happily tempered with knowledge. His work in connection with the Handel MSS. in the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge, the results of which are shown in the excellent catalogue recently published, would of itself entitle him to be regarded as an authority on the subject, and his latest labour is likely to have an effect still more practical and far-reaching. For some years past it has been the custom to give annual Festival Services in the magnificent chapel of King's College, perhaps the noblest purely perpendicular interior in the country. This year it occurred to Dr. Mann and those who acted with him to give a performance of Handel's "Messiah" under conditions that may fairly be described as novel. We have grown so accustomed to Mozart's additional accompaniments as to regard them as almost an integral part of the Oratorio. And indeed no musician would wish to see Mozart's beautiful and appropriate work done away with. It adorns Handel in the same way as the Renaissance screen is an ornament to the gothic interior at King's Chapel, though belonging to an entirely different type of art. But, apart from the fact that Mozart is by no means responsible for the accompaniments as we usually hear them, it is well that we should be permitted at least occasionally to realise Handel's music as it left his pen—or as near thereto as may be. The great difficulty that has hitherto stood in the way has been in respect of the wood-wind. It has been well known that oboes and bassoons were employed in Handel's time, but to what extent, and in what manner was a matter of uncertainty, as none of the contemporary scores give the parts for these instruments, save in the case of the chorus "Their sound is gone out," which was, by the way, a later addition. Here the oboe parts were written out, perhaps because they are of a more obbligato character. For, speaking generally, the oboes and bassoons were used chiefly to support the extreme vocal parts, and had but little independent work. The discovery made only a few months ago by Dr. Mann and Mr. Prout, at the Foundling Hospital, of the complete set of parts bequeathed by Handel to that Institution, is now widely known. It has enabled Dr. Mann to construct a complete score, the oboe and bassoon parts being taken from the Foundling Hospital set, and the rest from a careful comparison of Dr. Chrysander's admirable facsimile of the Buckingham Palace autograph score with the so-called "Dublin score," now belonging to St. Michael's College, Tenbury. So valuable and interesting a score as Dr. Mann's should not be allowed to remain in manuscript, and it is much to be hoped that it may be rendered accessible to conductors and other musicians by publication. The performance, on the 13th ult., was, it need hardly be said, one of the greatest possible interest to musicians. Nor was the interest merely archæological. Though the hearer constantly caught himself missing familiar phrases—here a Mozartean viola part, there a phrase for clarinet, the general effect was more satisfying than might have been expected from a score which appears so thin to nineteenth century ears. A grand pianoforte was used, as well as the organ, to represent the basso continuo of the score. There was considerable difference of opinion as to its effect, but for our own part its arpeggio chords sounded well, especially when, as in the case of the recitative, "There were Shepherds," they were heard together with the sustained notes of the bass strings. "For unto us" was none the less impressive for the absence of the usual sensational contrast between pianissimo vocalisation and the full blast of trombones and banging of drums. In the chorus "Lift up your heads," Handel's original text, "Who is this King of Glory," was restored. The air "Why do the nations" was sung without the customary Da capo, there being not only no indication of a repeat in the original score, but the parts bearing the direction Segue il coro subito. The abrupt transition certainly had the result of making the following chorus, "Let us break their bonds," all the more effective. "Since by man came death" and "For as in Adam all die" were taken as unaccompanied choruses. No attempt was made to reproduce the numbers of band and chorus of Handelian times, or even their relative proportions, the former numbering 63, the latter 200. It would be interesting, however, if the experiment could be made, say in the chapel of the Foundling Hospital, where Handel himself directed annual performances of "The Messiah" from 1750 to 1758. It only remains to chronicle the thoroughly efficient soloists, Miss Florence Monk, Miss Jessie King, Messrs. Gawthrop and Pierpoint, and to mention the judicious organ-playing of Mr. F. Dewberry and the thoroughly artistic manner in which Mr. C. Wood made use of the pianoforte. The performance was ably conducted by Dr. Mann.

MUSICAL GUILD.

THIS Society's Concerts maintain their high standard, but in spite of well-chosen programmes and generally excellent performances, the audiences attracted to them are anything but encouraging as regards numbers. At the second Concert, on May 29, at the Kensington Town Hall, Miss Isabella Donkersley was welcomed back as leader, and in the C minor Pianoforte Quartet (Op. 60) of her favourite, Brahms, once more displayed her exceptional qualifications as an interpretress of this master. Her partners were Miss Maggie Moore (pianoforte), Messrs. Alfred Hobday, and Paul Ludwig. A fine performance was also given of Haydn's String Quartet in G (Op. 5, No. 5). Miss Ethel Sharpe played some of Brahms's latest pianoforte pieces and did full justice to their manifold beauties, the weird, fascinating Intermezzo in E flat minor receiving an especially sympathetic interpretation. Mr. Claude Hobday proved himself a virtuoso on the double bass in two pieces by Bottesini, and Miss Serruys made a wholly favourable impression by her artistic singing of songs by Bemberg and Massenet. The third Concert, on the 12th ult., opened with a beautiful performance of Onslow's fine Quintet for wind instruments (Op. 81) and closed with Brahms's Clarinet Trio. The latter work was played by Mr. Charles Draper (an accomplished clarinettist), Miss Annie Grimson (pianoforte), and Mr. Paul Ludwig (violoncello). Miss Grimson and Mr. Ludwig were also heard in Beethoven's Violoncello Sonata (Op. 5, No. 2), in which the vigorous style and full tone of the violoncellist stood in marked contrast to the technically correct but somewhat timid performance of the pianist. Mr. John Sandbrook's sonorous bass voice was heard to advantage in the broadly declaimed Prologue to Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci" and two expressive Scotch songs by Mr. A. Davidson Arnott.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

THE twentieth season of the Musical Association was concluded on the 12th ult., when Mr. James Higgs read an interesting paper on "Samuel Wesley: his life, times, and influence on Music." Such a subject—or, it may be said, series of subjects—might obviously provide sufficient material for many lectures, and it was evident that Mr. Higgs had been embarrassed by the abundance of his knowledge. He, however, rightly devoted the greater part of his paper to the two brothers, Charles (born 1757) and Samuel (born 1766), both of whom, had they lived in this prodigy-loving age, would doubtless have been exploited in our concert-rooms and journals. According to the lovingly written records of their proud father, the Rev. Samuel Wesley, Charles played at two years and nine months, and his younger brother, Samuel, at three. Samuel, too, seems to have had his musical faculties as a child greatly developed by—we fear to write it—street organs, whose tunes he would play by ear. Of course he composed long before he could write, and thus his Oratorio "Ruth," the manuscript of which he presented, in his eighth year, to Dr. Boyce, was really composed when he was six. His extraordinary power of extemporisation, for which he in after years became so famed, was also shown as a child; and as soon as he was taught notation, which was done when he was between five and six, he quickly developed a wonderful rapidity in reading at sight. He would seem, moreover, to have been as quick-witted as he was musical, for one day when Dean Barrington ventured to excuse a passage which broke through established rules, Master Samuel answered: "When rules are so well grown composers should not break them unless the effects are good, and the effect here is not good, but ugly." The Rev. S. Wesley moved to London in 1771, and Mr. Higgs gave some very interesting particulars concerning the series of chamber concerts which Charles and Samuel gave at their father's house from 1779 to 1785. Samuel's organ playing formed a distinguishing feature at these concerts, but the programmes were well varied and attracted a sufficient number of subscribers to make them pecuniarily successful. Samuel Wesley's attention seems to have been first attracted to Bach's music in 1800, and Wesley and Horn's first edition of the Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues were probably published in 1810. Some amusing objections were, it seems, raised against their publication, one of them being the unnecessary difficulty of some of the keys in which they were written. Wesley, who ultimately regarded the popularisation of Bach's music in England as his life mission, persevered, however, with results that are well known. In after years he seems to have devoted much time to teaching and to lecturing, and was much sought after "in society." He seems to always have preserved his quick wit, in spite of a severe injury to his head, resulting from a fall, which subjected him to periods of melancholia. Being asked by a wealthy amateur to impart the secret of his power of extemporisation, he replied: "When I know how I do it I will gladly teach you." Speaking of the organ in St. Paul's Cathedral he remarked: "The keys are as stubborn as 'Fox's Martyrs,' and are almost as much buffeted." He commented severely on the slovenly manner in which the week-day services in our Cathedrals about 1828 were "galloped over," and the selection of services by King and Kent instead of those of Purcell, &c. In conclusion, Mr. Higgs pleaded for a wider recognition of Samuel Wesley's music and the publication of much that was now lying in undeserved neglect.

During the discussion which followed, Sir John Stainer, who occupied the chair, said that he feared there was good ground for Wesley's indictment against the Cathedral authorities. When he went as organist to St. Paul's Cathedral he remembered discovering a simple anthem of about thirty bars on which was written "Very useful for a cold morning." Concerning King and Kent's services, however, it should not be forgotten that they were the first of the series of the melodious and non-contrapuntal school which was the reaction against the old contrapuntal services, many of which were very dry and exceedingly difficult to sing. Mr. W. H. Cummings said it seemed astounding that Wesley should have opposed "equal temperament" and yet have worked so zealously for the wider appreciation of Bach's "Forty-eight," which were specially written for the "equal temperament" scheme. He also suggested that Mr. Higgs should collect and publish Samuel Wesley's letters, which were remarkably interesting reading.

WAGNER SOCIETY.

THE annual Conversazione of the Wagner Society was held on the 12th ult., by kind permission, at Mr. Dowdeswell's Fine Art Galleries, New Bond Street, and proved to be one of the most successful the Society has given. A representative selection from the master's vocal writings was sung by Miss Pauline Cramer and Miss Beatrice Frost, and two papers were read respectively by Mr. Charles Dowdeswell and Mr. Henry F. Frost. Mr. Dowdeswell took for his subject the Persian poet, Hafiz, who lived and died in the fifteenth century, and concerning the inner meaning of whose poems Goethe, Emerson, and many other thoughtful writers have left to posterity more or less contradictory opinions. Wagner in his correspondence makes several allusions to the works of Hafiz, and in a letter dated October 14, 1852, he writes: "Do study Hafiz carefully; he is the greatest and most sublime philosopher. Certainly no other writer has given the great question so sure and irrefutable an answer. There is only one thing—that which he commands. All beside is not worth one farthing, however high and noble it may call itself. Something similar to this will also be shown in my own 'Nibelungen.'" Although when Wagner wrote thus it was more than two years before he commenced his exhaustive study of Schopenhauer, there can be little doubt but that the poems of Hafiz exercised considerable influence in the development of Wagner's ideas, and hence consideration of this poet's works was happily appropriate to the occasion. Mr. Dowdeswell gave a brief but lucid sketch of the controversy which, from the moment that Western and even some Eastern scholars first turned their attention to Hafiz, has been carried on—viz., whether the poet simply meant what he wrote, or spoke allegorically of eternal truths. The lecturer inclined to the latter view, but at the same time expressed his opinion that no theory would ever fully explain Hafiz's writings. Thus when scientific criticism had said its last words, wonder would step in and play for ever about him, and his works were another illustration of the truth of Schopenhauer's profound words: "Not only philosophy, but also the fine arts work at bottom towards the solution of the problem of existence." If Mr. Dowdeswell's paper may be said to have dealt with the mystical, Mr. Frost's decidedly concerned itself with the practical. Its title was "Hints to Bayreuth Pilgrims," and very useful hints they proved to be, as many of those who heard them and visit Bayreuth this year for the first time will doubtless find. The lecturer, or, rather, speaker, who has apparently tried all the various routes, related the results of his many experiences in a chatty and graphic manner, the interest of his remarks being heightened by an admirable series of pictures thrown on a screen by the aid of a magic lantern. These views included the exterior and interior of the far-famed theatre, the approach to and rooms in Wagner's house, and the master's simple tomb, whereupon, Mr. Frost said, some loving floral tribute was always to be found.

THE HOPE-JONES ELECTRIC ORGAN.

ON May 31 and the 1st ult. a large number of musicians accepted the invitation of Mr. Thomas Threlfall to view the organ recently re-constructed at his house in Hyde Park Terrace. The instrument, which was originally built by Mr. Gern, has been re-built by the same builder, the Hope-Jones Electric Organ Company making and fixing the electric action. The voicing of some of the stops is exquisite, but interest naturally centres on the electro-pneumatic action, by means of which the organ is played; and here, of course, are the peculiar features of all organs constructed (or re-built) on the Hope-Jones system. The console is moveable, as compact and portable as a harmonium; the flexible cable (connecting the console with the organ) being in this case about sixty feet in length. The touch, with full organ on, is lighter than that of an ordinary pianoforte (any number of couplers making no difference in this respect). The current required for the whole organ, which contains over sixty stops, is barely sufficient to ring a house-bell, three small dry cells being ample, and allowing for a large margin of current in reserve into the bargain. The promptitude of speech is remarkable; any pallet speaking instantaneously and with perfect repetition, increase in the number of stops or couplers up to full organ making no difference on this point. Each manual also has the much-discussed "double-touch," which (with a little practice) should make many new and charming effects in tone-colour perfectly feasible and easy of execution. The organ clearly proved that here at last we have an electric action as reliable and trustworthy as any other kind of action with which organs are played. It appeared as though the accomplished pianist and the neat "technique-perfect" organist will show to great advantage on an organ of this kind. There was not a ghost of a cypher or hitch of any sort.

REVIEWS.

Basses and Melodies for Students of Harmony. Selected or adapted from the works of the great composers by Ralph Dunstan, Mus. Doc., Cantab. (Novello's Music Primers, No. 44.) [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS valuable addition to Novello's well known series of educational works will be found to cover two important branches of musical study. Its contents are so arranged that a student of harmony will pass through a graduated series of basses for harmonisation, commencing with triads and proceeding step by step, with short but quite adequate explanations of each successive chord, until the most advanced pupil will discover that he has his work cut out if he wishes to produce a respectable specimen of harmony. It has been often said, as an objection to books such as these, that the exercises and examples are the sort of thing which might enter the head of a theorist, but would never come from the pen of a decent composer. Dr. Dunstan has entirely guarded himself against this attack by selecting all his basses from known authors. The good result is obvious—the book becomes a practical introduction not to theory only, but to composition also. The second important branch of study which Dr. Dunstan has so well laid before the student is the art of "playing from a figured bass." This is often said to be a lost art, and sometimes much undeserved praise is given to a young person who can harmonise "at sight." This art certainly ought not to be allowed to fall into disuse; it constituted the very groundwork of training half-a-century ago, and if people could only be made to believe it, it is just as important to the musical student now as it was then. Dr. Dunstan provides special exercises to be worked out on the pianoforte, and if these are done under the eye of a teacher the benefit to the pupil will be enormous. Much of the clumsy unvocal harmonisation which examiners are constantly deploring is due to the common neglect of playing regularly from figured basses. The expert at this art passes with a light heart during his paper work over difficulties and pitfalls which plunge the mere "paper musician" into the gulf of despair; the one can recall mentally the sound of the many similar passages he has played; the other, after duly scratching his head (apparently a physical necessity among examinees), ends by putting down something which he thinks "looks all right," but which he ought to know would sound execrable. One other advantage is to be gained from Dr. Dunstan's useful primer; all who have been examined in harmony (and in these days who has not?) are painfully aware that there is a marked difference in the style and character of figured basses. The difference is so great that a pupil who has become an expert in one style of bass will find himself completely upset at the novelty and the unusual appearance and texture of basses framed by another hand. Thus it often happens that success in an examination is turned into failure owing simply to the fact that the pupil has worked only in one groove. This danger is entirely removed by Dr. Dunstan: he has selected basses of all sorts and kinds, and of all periods. A goodly array of melodies for harmonisation brings the first part to a close. The second part goes over ground rarely trod and where students stand greatly in need of a helping-hand; it gives basses to be harmonised in six, seven, and eight parts. These are followed by basses from great masters for advanced students, and a capital set of chorale melodies to be harmonised in six, seven, and eight parts. An appendix, giving an admirable account of obsolete methods of figuring, and another giving hints to the student how to surmount special difficulties in some of the exercises, bring to an end one of the most useful books of its kind which we have ever seen. Dr. Dunstan has done in the sphere of harmony what Dr. Gordon Saunders ("Strict Counterpoint") has done for the young contrapuntist. If these two Primers are conscientiously used at the keys of a pianoforte as well as on the study writing table, an immense advance ought to take place in the level of work done for diplomas and degrees, examiners would certainly have lighter work, and examinees would leave the examination-room with lighter hearts! All students now-a-days require, however, to be warned against the popular notion that a good tutor or a good book will relieve them from the necessity of working: it is amusingly common to hear a plucked examinee lay all the blame on his tutor or his text-book, and yet it generally follows that if he succeeds it is—he complacently believes—entirely owing to his own superior ability! In this respect, a tutor and a text-book are somewhat in the awkward position of the coxswain of a racing eight-oar: if the race is won, it is due to the good rowing; if lost, it is attributed to the bad steering. Then, again, the young student should not be encouraged to criticise his tutor or text-book too freely; it will be time enough for him to search for other's faults when he is in the position of an examiner and not of an examinee. The undue growth of this critical spirit makes a pupil create artificial difficulties and doubts in order to show his own acumen. Such youngsters (there are many of them) should be told that time is better employed in improving oneself than in depreciating others. It was, we believe, Sir Arthur Sullivan who said that we have now in England plenty of good performers, but are sorely in need of good hearers of music. We might, perhaps, be allowed to add that we have now plenty of good educational books, but that people require to be trained how to use them. Certainly, if this admirable little book by Dr. Dunstan, and others in the same series, are rightly read and receive the encouragement they deserve, we could not as a nation be charged with having only a superficial taste for, and knowledge of, the beautiful art of which we so loudly protest our admiration.

Richard Wagner's Prose Works. Translated by William Ashton Ellis. [Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner and Co.]

MR. ELLIS has now, in his second volume, published "Opera and Drama," that famous treatise which, at the time of its appearance, created such a sensation. As Mr. Dannreuther truly observes, the attention which it attracted was owing not so much to the propositions put forth, or to the brilliancy of the writing, as to the "fierce attacks on living composers which it contained." Let one suffice by way of illustration: "In Meyerbeer's music there is shown so appalling an emptiness, shallowness, and artistic nothingness, that—especially when compared with by far the larger number of his musical contemporaries—we are tempted to set down his specific musical capacity at zero." Mr. Ellis, in his "Translator's Preface," gives some interesting details about the history of the treatise. The "first unmistakable shadowing forth" of "Oper und Drama" was in a letter addressed by Wagner to his friend, Uhlig, on September 20, 1850: "In any case, I will shortly send you rather a long article on modern opera—about Rossini and Meyerbeer." When "Oper und Drama" had been printed, Wagner made Uhlig a present of the manuscript, but the latter had died in 1853, and it was returned by Uhlig's family to the author, at Wagner's own request, apparently in 1879. Mr. Ellis gives a translation of a characteristic letter from Wagner to Uhlig when he gave him permission to keep the manuscript. The last sentence runs thus: "But above all take cheer from the binding, in which I have endeavoured to reverse Goethe's saying, 'Grey, my friend, is every theory'; so that I may call to you with a good conscience, 'Red, O friend, is this my theory.'" In Mr. Ellis's preface there are some exceedingly noteworthy remarks about the extracts from "Oper und Drama" which appeared in the Deutsche Monatsschrift; if these articles be compared with the parallel passages of "Oper und Drama" it will be found that "there are a number of minor alterations and one very important addition." We quite agree with Mr. Ellis when he says that "to criticise the book as a whole is scarcely the province of its translator"; at the same time, one cannot but feel grateful to him for certain comments which he makes. He considers the work "combines all the advantages and disadvantages of having been written at a terrific pace"—the work was dashed off in four months. "The advantages," he goes on to say, "might have been retained, and the disadvantages removed by laying aside the completed manuscript for a few months, and then taking it up, for purposes of revision, with the impartial eye of practically a stranger." This excellent piece of advice comes too late for Wagner, but any authors who come across it will do well to make a note of it. If followed it might improve some books, and, in certain cases, possibly, cut out root and branches. Mr. Ellis hopes shortly "to be able to take up the whole matter (i.e., "Oper und Drama") in a series of articles," of course in The Meister, and for that promise many who feel the want of a guide, philosopher, and friend will heartily thank him. One more allusion to the interesting "Translator's Preface"; to notice the treatise itself would require more space than stands at present at disposal. Mr. Ellis calls attention to the difficulties of his task. This is no mere mock humility; Wagner's prose-writing, like his music, is fearfully and wonderfully made, and, to translate it, "knocks," as Mr. Ellis justly says, "the vanity out of any man." For the ability and earnestness which he has shown, and for his patience, his constant anxiety not in any way to misrepresent the master, all students, especially those who do not read German, will be most grateful. The third volume will contain, inter alia, "A Theatre for Zurich," "Judaism in Music," and "On the Performance of 'Tannhäuser.'"

Rivista Musicale Italiana. Anno I. Fascicolo 2°. [Turin: Bocca.]

THE first number of this excellent quarterly magazine has already been brought before the notice of our readers. There is no falling away from the high standard then reached, in this, the second issue of the publication. Among the articles of special interest to musical antiquaries may be named that on a poem of Petrarch, set to music by Du Fay, the manuscript of which is in the University library at Bologna. With a fac-simile of the MS. is given also a transcription of the music into modern notation. It is written for three voices in triple time, and shows an ability on the part of this old master to write tunefully and gracefully that will probably surprise many of his modern readers. This article, which is signed by F. X. Haberl and G. Lisio, is supplemented by a critical commentary on the music and poetry of the piece from the pen of the last-named. The music of Palestrina is dealt with in an article by G. Tebaldini, which contains many illustrations from the works of that master. The number contains four articles in the French language, one of these—"La Berceuse Populaire," by E. de Schoultz-Adaïewsky—being a remarkably interesting study of this particular branch of folk-song. M. Kufferath contributes a sympathetic article on Bülow, and M. Ernst gives a critical analysis of Massenet's "Thais." The reviews contain notices, we are glad to see, of many English publications.

Mass for Six Voices, "Euge Bone." By Dr. Christopher Tye. The Old English Edition, No. 10. [Joseph Williams.]

DR. TYE was ranked by Fuller among the Worthies of Westminster, and he justly occupies a distinguished place in musical literature. He is principally known by

> The Acts of the Holy Apostles turn'd into verse
> Which I haue set in seuerall parts to sing.

But he wrote many excellent compositions and much of his music still exists in manuscript. The Mass under notice is supposed to have been written as an exercise for Tye's degree of Bachelor or Doctor at Cambridge, and the learning displayed in it fully justifies that supposition. The music, however, is no valley of dry contrapuntal bones; the bold style, the fulness of the harmonies, and the deep feeling show that the composer's heart as well as his head was engaged in the work. The mass is a remarkable composition. In this "Old English Edition" there is a valuable Introduction giving an account of the original manuscript of the Mass, also an interesting biographical memoir of Dr. Tye. There is besides a fac-simile of the composer's signature from an Ely manuscript.

Fifteen English Songs. By Jacques Blumenthal (Op. 100). [Joseph Williams.]

THE words of these songs are from the pen of Gwendolen Gore, who has already displayed taste and ability as the translator of German poems. Love is here her principal theme: one of which the world never tires, and one which offers special opportunities to a composer. Mr. Blumenthal possesses the secret of appealing to popular taste without becoming vulgar; the melodies are tuneful, the form is clear and simple, and thus he finds favour with all kinds of singers. But there is nothing crude or commonplace about his music; intimate union of tone and word, harmonies of rare delicacy and often delightful effect, and clever and pleasing pianoforte accompaniments give to these songs a special cachet, and win for them the esteem of musicians.

Steadiness and Flexibility of the Bow. By J. Jacques Haakman. [Charles Woolhouse.]

THIS consists of six exercises for the violin in the first position, which are well calculated to cultivate that steadiness and flexibility in bowing without which no violinist can hope to charm his listeners. The exercises are arranged in order of increasing difficulty, and each is furnished with marks for bowing and other indications of valuable assistance to the student. They are, moreover, sufficiently melodious and rhythmical to engage the attention, and the pupil who can play the sixth exercise to the satisfaction of his master may count himself already well advanced.

Fifty Solfeggi pour le médium de la voix. By F. Paolo Tosti. [Enoch and Sons.]

THESE vocal exercises, intended to strengthen and give increased command over the voice, are similar in character to the celebrated series by Concone, and as such will be doubtless welcomed by many teachers and vocalists. The solfeggi have the great merit of being written in the middle register of the voice, where there is the least risk of injury being done to the vocal chords by over-straining, and where all true voice-training must begin. Their limited compass also makes them available for use by all voices, and it is almost unnecessary to add that their popular composer has made them musically interesting.

THE Tonic Sol-fa Association announces two great Concerts to be held at the Crystal Palace on Saturday, the 14th inst. There will be a performance by 5,000 juvenile certificated singers at 1 p.m., conducted by Mr. George Merritt; and another at 3.45 p.m., by 3,000 adult performers from London and the provinces. At the latter Concert the new sacred cantata, "The King's Error," by Henry Coward, of Sheffield, will be performed for the first time. The composer will conduct. A large contingent of the choir and band will come from Sheffield.

THE establishment during the present month, in George Street, Hanover Square, of "The Musical Exchange," a club for the convenience of musicians and others interested in the world of music, will no doubt be cordially welcomed. A special feature of the Musical Exchange will be the admission of lady members, an innovation which will no doubt be appreciated by the fair sex. The club will be under the management of Mr. Percy Notcutt.

A PERFORMANCE of the "Golden Legend" has been arranged to take place in the Adelaide Jubilee Exhibition Building on the 3rd inst., under the direction of Mr. C. J. Stevens. The chorus and orchestra will number over 400, and the solo vocalists engaged are Madame Emily Spada, Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Philip Newbury, and Mr. Charles Magrath.

MESSRS. ROGERS AND SON, who have hitherto been known only as the makers of upright pianofortes, have now commenced making "grands," specimens of which are to be seen in their showrooms in Berners Street.

ORGAN Recitals are being given weekly on Wednesdays, in St. Michael's, Cornhill. The players during June have been Dr. C. W. Pearce, Dr. W. J. Reynolds, and Mr. Henry Riding.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Amsterdam.—During the past season the Concert-house Orchestra, under Mynheer Kes, gave nine Beethoven Concerts, at which the "Immortal Nine" were performed in chronological order, as well as the whole of the overtures, the five Pianoforte Concertos, the Violin and Triple Concertos, the "Prometheus" and "Egmont" music, and the Septet.

Berlin.—At a recent sale of musical autographs, the original of Weber's "Invitation to the dance" fetched 3,003 marks. This manuscript was for many years in the market at 300 marks without finding a purchaser. At the sale in question, fifty sheets of sketches by Beethoven were sold for 1,850 marks; a song, "Antigone," by Schubert, fetched 460 marks; Gluck's sketches to "Iphigenia in Tauris," 1,610 marks; an Aria for bass, by Mozart, 1,375 marks; a sacred song, "Ich hatte meine Zuversicht," by J. S. Bach, 350 marks; a fragment from Haydn's opera, "L'isola disabitata," 525 marks; drafts of two letters of Wagner's, 185 and 140 marks respectively; and last, not least, the portrait of Mozart, drawn from life, by Doris Stock, 1,510 marks. Most of these treasures were purchased by Dr. Max Adams, the proprietor of the great publishing house of C. F. Peters, of Leipzig, to be added to the free library which he lately opened in that town.——Smetana's opera, "The Sold Bride," has at last found its way to the Royal Opera, where it was recently given for the first time, and achieved an emphatic and genuine success. That erudite and severe critic, Dr. Otto Lessmann, gives it as his opinion that Smetana's work is the best comic opera in the old style which has been produced since Mozart's "Figaro" and Rossini's "Barber," and that it would have to be considered an absolute masterpiece if the third act were dramatically on the level of the rest.——A new opera in one act, "Angla," by Ferdinand Hummel, the composer of the successful "Mara," was produced at the Royal Opera, on the 9th ult., but without much success.

Bremen.—The Festspielhaus à la Bayreuth, which it was the intention of some Rubinstein enthusiasts to erect in this town, is not yet to be. The eternal money question has killed the project, unless it will only delay it, as it only delayed its famous prototype. Lacking the special Rubinstein Theatre, the pianist-composer's friends will content themselves with ten performances of "Christus" at the local Town Theatre.

Brunswick.—At a Concert given recently by the Teachers' Choral Society a new heroic song (Heldengesang), "Hermann the deliverer," for soli, male chorus, and orchestra, by Karl Zuschneid, was produced with striking success. The work is said to be a really valuable addition to the répertoire of male voice cantatas.

Budapest.—At the Royal Hungarian Opera House a new opera, entitled "Die Büsser," and founded on a Buddhist subject, by Edmund Farkas, director of the Klausenburg (Transylvania) Conservatoire of Music, was produced on April 21, with but very little success. It will be remembered that a drama of this title (also called "Die Sieger"), which was to be the successor to "Parsifal," is said to be amongst the MSS. left by Wagner. ——A marble memorial tablet has lately been attached to the house in which the excellent composer, Richard Volkmann, lived for many years and wrote some of his finest works.

Cassel.—Berlioz's "Faust" has lately been performed at the Court Theatre here for the first time with the greatest éclat. The conductor, Dr. Beier, who, by an able analysis, had assisted the audience towards a better understanding of the strikingly original work, and who, moreover, secured an excellent performance, was presented at the conclusion of the Concert with a massive silver laurel wreath, on the leaves of which the names of the donors were engraved.

Cologne.—Further details respecting the first performance of Niccola Spinelli's new opera "A Basso Porto," point to the fact that the success of the work was quite phenomenal, and greatly exceeded that of the "Cavalleria" and other successful novelties of the last few years. Like Byron, the fortunate composer awoke one morning and found himself famous. His music is said to be full of quite unusual beauties, some critics going so far as to assert that the Finale to the second act has no equal in all Italian opera. Spinelli was "called" more than twenty times, quite an exceptional honour for a German audience to pay an author.——Herr P. J. Tonger has recently issued a hitherto unpublished song by Beethoven, curiously entitled "Elegy on the death of a poodle." The manuscript is in the possession of the well-known Beethoven enthusiast, Dr. Erich Prieger, of Bonn, who is of opinion that it was composed about the same time as "Adelaide."

Darmstadt.—Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" was performed here for the first time, on the 6th ult., with great success.

Emden.—On May 20 the local Church Choir performed the rarely heard Oratorio "The Raising of Lazarus," by Carl Löwe, of "Balladen" fame. The work is said to have been greatly appreciated.

Freiburg (Baden).—Herren R. Birnschein and H. Rückbeil, two members of the orchestra at the local theatre, are the poet and composer respectively of a one-act Märchenspiel (fairy play), entitled "Eine Kyffhäusersage" (a legend of the Kyffhäuser), which was recently produced here very successfully.

Hanover.—An influential committee has been formed here to erect a monument to Richard Wagner. It would be an everlasting disgrace to the master's native place, Leipzig, if it should come to pass that another town forestalled it in thus honouring the memory of the greatest genius which Germany has produced this century.

Heidelberg.—On the 7th ult. the Bach-Verein gave an impressive Hans von Bülow "In Memoriam" Concert, under the direction of Herr Felix Mottl and Dr. Ph. Wolfrum. Of the deceased master's works the "Funerale" (Op. 18) and "Nirwana" (Op. 20) for orchestra, three "Poems" for mixed choir (Op. 15), a song cycle, "Die Entsagende" (Op. 8), and some pianoforte pieces were performed. Liszt's "Les Préludes," Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan," and the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" completed the programme.

Innsbruck.—On May 9 Wagner's "Walküre" was given here for the first time at the Town Theatre. A capital performance and a great success are reported.

Leipzig.—At the last Concert of the Liszt Society, the great pianist-composer's "Faust" Symphony was superbly played by the band of the 134th Infantry Regiment, under the direction of that facile princeps of Liszt conductors, Herr Felix Weingartner, of Berlin. At the conclusion of the performance a laurel wreath was handed to him, which he, however, modestly placed on the score of Liszt's work. ——On May 30 the centenary of the birth of Ignaz Moscheles was celebrated by a special Concert at the Conservatoire, at which he was a teacher for so many years.

Linz.—"Klopstock in Zürich," a new lyric drama, poem by Max Morold (no relation to Isolde's ill-fated first lover), music by Jos. Reiter, was lately performed several times with success at the Landestheater. The authors say of their work that they conceived and executed it as a genuine German opera in the "higher Wagnerian style" (beautiful phrase!), and intended it to "answer the requirements of a genuine German Opera House in a thoroughly ideal manner."

Mannheim.—E. Humperdinck's fairy opera, "Hänsel und Gretel," is continuing its successful progress through the German opera houses. It has now been added to the répertoire of the Court Theatre here. Its first performance, on the 6th ult., was a great success, in spite of a very inadequate mounting.

Milan.—Signor Leoncavallo, of "Pagliacci" fame, has tried his hand on a Symphonic Poem for chorus and orchestra, which was successfully produced in the Exhibition Theatre here on the 3rd ult. The work bears the title of "Serafitus Serafita," and is founded on one of Balzac's extraordinary creations. It is in three parts: 1, on Talberg; 2, the Temptation; 3, the Assumption. ——The Società del Quartetto offers prizes of 1,000 and of 500 livres for the two best string quartets. Competitors must be of Italian nationality.——Signor Samara's new opera "The Martyr" was produced on May 24 with much success. Needless to add that the "Martyr" in question is a lady. No Italian audience would take the slightest interest in a gentleman martyr.

PARIS.—The Académie des Beaux Arts has awarded the "Monbinne" prize of 3,000 francs to M. Alfred Bruneau for his opera "L'attaque du Moulin." The "Deschaumes" prize of 1,500 francs was awarded to M. Dumesnil, and the "Chartier" prize of 1,000 francs for chamber music to M. Léon Boellmann.——In the place of the late Charles Gounod, M. Théodore Dubois has been elected a member of the Académie, his unsuccessful competitors having been MM. Joncières, Widor, and Godard. M. Dubois, who is fifty-seven years old, is organist at the Madeleine Church and professor of composition at the Conservatoire. His works include a setting of the "Seven Words of the Redeemer," which is frequently performed in French churches on Good Friday. His ballet, "Farandole," had a great success, but an opera, "Aben Hamet," produced in Paris in 1884, was a comparative failure.——On May 24 a new Féerie dramatique, entitled "La Belle au bois dormant" (anglicé, "The Sleeping Beauty"), by MM. Henry Bataille and Robert d'Humières, music by M. Georges Hüe, was produced at the Nouveau Théâtre. The libretto is considered badly done, but M. Hüe has wedded some very charming music to it, while the decorations are splendid.——Verdi's "Othello" will be definitely performed at the Grand Opéra in October next. M. Maurel has already signed the contract, according to which he will sing the part of Iago, Madame Rose Caron will be Desdemona, and M. Saleza, Othello. After "Othello," Madame Augusta Holmés's opera, "La Montagne noir," will be produced.——An interesting new departure has been made by the Mairie of the twenty-second Arrondissement—viz., gratuitous Concerts of classical chamber music for the people. An audience of over 600 listened with the greatest interest to a programme containing, amongst other masterpieces, Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata, superbly played by M. Marsick and Mdlle. Rose Depecker. This first trial Concert was such a great success that other Arrondissements will no doubt follow suit.——"Djelma," a three-act opera, the libretto by M. Charles Lomon and composed by M. Charles Lefebvre, was produced on May 25 at the Théâtre de l'Opéra, with Madame Caron in the title rôle. The action of the piece takes place in India in the last century and is absurd to a degree, but the music is praised for its melodiousness. The work as a whole, however, failed to make any effect.——A so-called "Grand Festival to the memory of Gounod," or, as it would have been called in London, a Gounod Concert, was given on the 12th ult. at the Trocadéro, by the Société des Grandes Auditions Musicales de France. The programme included selections from "Sapho," "La Reine de Saba," "Polyeucte," "Mors et Vita" (the "Judex" from which made an immense impression), and "The Redemption." Fräulein Lola Beeth, from Vienna, sang the principal air from the latter work with such fine effect that she had to repeat it. Special interest attached to the production of the deceased master's last composition, of which he also wrote the words; this was a song entitled "Repentir." The whole Concert was repeated a few days afterwards, when admission was free.——Apropos of the thousandth performance of "Mignon" at the Opéra Comique, M. Ambroise Thomas has been decorated with the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour, the highest distinction which has ever been paid to a musician by the French Government; Auber, Rossini, and Gounod having only been "Grand Officers," while MM. Saint-Saëns and Massenet are simple "Officers."——As a sign of the times it may be worth mentioning that an appreciative essay on that most typically German amongst living composers, Brahms, has lately been published by Fischbacher. Its title is "Etude sur Johannes Brahms," and its author M. Hugués Imbert. A translation, by M. Henri de Curzon, of Schumann's "Ueber Musik und Musiker" has also just been issued by the same firm.

SARAGOSSA.—Musical Festivals are extremely rare in Spain, but this town has lately enjoyed a three days' feast of sound on the Plaza de Toros. No less than 1,200 executants are said to have taken part, under the direction of Señor Goula, and the success was enormous.

SONDERSHAUSEN.—The first musical Festival arranged by the Union of German Students' Choral Societies was celebrated here with great éclat on Whit-Sunday and Monday. Students' choirs from the Universities of Berlin, Bonn, Erlangen, Göttingen, Graz, Greifswald, Halle, Innsbruck, Kiel, Leipzig, Marburg, Munich, Strassburg, Vienna, and Würzburg took part in the Concerts. Much enthusiasm prevailed, and the 600 youthful singers crammed an all but endless round of amusements into the hours which were not devoted to the divine art.

STOCKHOLM.—At the Royal Opera House M. Saint-Saëns's opéra comique, "Phryné," was performed for the first time on May 12, and warmly received. Fröken Anna Petterson, hitherto known as an operetta singer, was a successful interpretress of the fascinating courtesan who gives the work its name.

STUTTGART.—On May 24 Cyrill Kistler's music-drama, "Kunihild," was given for the first time with great success at the Royal Opera. A special performance of the work took place on the 8th ult., àpropos of the meeting of German Court Theatre Intendants and Theatre Directors which was held here this year. At a supper given after the performance by the Stuttgart Intendant, Herr von Putlitz, both that gentleman and Freiherr von Perfall, late Intendant of the Munich Court Theatre, proposed toasts to the composer, who was greeted with a genuine ovation.

ST. PETERSBURG.—The Geographical Society has lately published its report on the expedition which, at the request of the Imperial Academy of Sciences, it sent last summer into the governments of Wjatka, Wologda, and Kostrome, for the purpose of collecting the folk-songs of these districts. The document reveals the sad fact that folk-songs have all but disappeared, and that only the oldest inhabitants have some recollection of them. In the barracks and manufactories, as well as in the people's homes, the vulgar music hall tunes of Western Europe have taken the place of the beautiful old melodies, so full of feeling and so racy of the soil. Just as in other countries nearer home!

TURIN.—On May 20 a bust of the lately deceased composer, Carlo Pedrotti, was unveiled in the local Musical Lyceum, of which he had been director. The ceremony was followed by a Concert devoted exclusively to works of this musician.

VIENNA.—The Richard Wagner Museum has acquired the MS. full score of "Rienzi," which for several years was exhibited in the town museum at Eger. This score was, on February 19, 1846, sent by the composer from Dresden to Theodor Krüthner, who was then conductor of the "Cur" orchestra at Mariabad. It is not throughout in Wagner's autograph, but contains, in red ink, very numerous corrections, improvements, and additions, which, no doubt, should be considered the composer's final ideas of this "sin of his youth," as he afterwards contemptuously styled it.——On May 25 the Imperial Court Opera celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of the opening of the present magnificent building by performing Mozart's "Don Giovanni," which work was played on the first night, May 25, 1869. Of the artists who took part in this inaugural performance, Frau Materna (who afterwards became the first Brünnhilde in "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," and the first Kundry in "Parsifal"), Herr Georg Müller, and Herr Carl Meyerhofer are still amongst the best members of the Institution. Eighty-five new operas, Singspiele, &c., have been produced during the twenty-five years, as well as fifty ballets.

WEIMAR.—In place of Richard Strauss, who has been appointed one of the Conductors of the Munich Opera, Herr Richard Sahla, from Bückeburg, has been engaged for the Weimar Court Opera.——At the general meeting held in connection with the thirtieth Tonkünstler-Versammlung, it was resolved to erect a monument here to Franz Liszt. The suggestion came from two of the pianist's oldest pupils, the Misses Anna and Helene Stahr of this place, who at once headed a subscription with a substantial amount. If Liszt is to have a monument besides the imperishable one which he himself has erected in the hearts of all who ever came in contact with him or studied his true greatness of character, then Weimar is the only possible place for it.——At the thirtieth "Tonkünstlerversammlung des Allgemeinen deutschen Musikereins" no absolutely new works of exceptional importance were produced, but the meeting was one of great interest, inasmuch as the musicians present had an opportunity of witnessing performances of Verdi's "Falstaff" and Richard Strauss's "Guntram," and thus comparing the latest works of Italy's oldest and Germany's youngest dramatic masters.

For that "Guntram" is a work of genius seems as certain as that Strauss will have to simplify his style in future if he expects vocalists to sing and orchestras to play his music. Up to the present Wagner's "Tristan" has been considered the most trying of all operas, both to the principal singers and the orchestral players, but Strauss's work surpasses Wagner's chef d'œuvre in both respects, the part of Guntram, sung by Herr Zelle, being more difficult and even considerably longer than that of Tristan, while the orchestral players' tasks presented difficulties hitherto undreamt of even in those gentlemen's Wagnerian philosophy. That it contains great beauties is generally conceded. The poem, by the composer, is written under the direct influence of Wagner, and more particularly of his "Parsifal." The plot is peculiar, mystic, full of psychological riddles, and not very dramatic. The absolute novelties produced at the meeting were "Titan, a tone-poem in symphonic form," by G. Mahler, a strange piece of music with an absurd, far-fetched programme; a String Quartet in F by Max Puchat, and a String Quintet by August Klughardt.

Würzburg.—Berlioz's "Requiem" was given here lately by the music school. The choir consisted of 304 singers and the orchestra of 108 players, and the unique work made an unusually deep impression through being performed in a church (the Universitätskirche), instead of a concert-room. Considering the size of the town, the grand scale on which the work was given, as well as the excellence of the performance, redound greatly to the credit of the Conductor, Dr. Kliebert.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company, defying all considerations of "season," made their advent here at a particularly dull period. They gave seven performances (from May 28 to the 2nd ult.), their programme being of a strikingly Wagnerian complexion. Besides "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin," wherein by this time we are fairly versed, we had our curiosity satisfied as to the merits of "Rienzi." In addition to these Wagnerian operas, Gounod's "Roméo et Juliette," Mr. Friend's curious and interesting adaptation of Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust," and, lastly (to satisfy, if possible, all tastes!), "Carmen" and the lately rejuvenated "Daughter of the Regiment" were produced; all to good audiences, "Tannhäuser" especially creating the utmost (anticipatory) enthusiasm.

The Concert given in honour of Mr. Stockley was highly successful, and we have no doubt that gentleman has thereby become rewarded and recouped, to some extent, for his arduous labours and monetary sacrifices upon the orchestral work with which his name is now identified. It is too late in the day now to refer in detail to this Concert. We will only remark that the programme was arranged on the "voting" principle, and that it was significant that no Symphony came towards the "top of the list"; among the more favoured works appearing the "Tannhäuser" Overture, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" music, and Mr. German's ballet music to "Henry VIII."

The work of preparation (of the choral music) for the forthcoming Festival goes steadily on, under Mr. Stockley's direction. On Monday, the 11th ult., Mr. Georg Henschel paid a visit to the Masonic Hall to conduct a rehearsal of his "Stabat Mater." The Wednesday evening following Dr. Richter also appeared, and the Mass in D minor of Cherubini was gone through (or partly so) under his bâton. Dr. Richter made a short but very feeling speech to the choristers assembled, wherein he referred to his recent illness.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A few remnants of the musical season, that occurred too late for last month's issue of The Musical Times, have to be noticed.

The Choral Society of St. John, Redland, which has done much useful work since its formation in 1883, and has performed many smaller cantatas, essayed "St. John's Eve" on May 24, under the direction of Mr. A. E. Hill. Considering the difficulties of the work, and the fact that it was given for the first time by the Society, the results were in the main very creditable. The subdued singing was particularly good, but the more catchy points of the cantata were not so satisfactory. When the cantata is given again, as assuredly it should be, much better results will attend its performance. The solos were sung by Miss Marion Harris, Miss Maud Jones, Mr. Vincent Barnard, and Mr. A. E. Gough. In the second part of the programme the choir sang Rossini's glee "The Carnovale" and Hatton's part-song "Softly fall the shades of evening." Miss M. Bradshaw, Mr. Kendall, Mr. Mogford, and Mr. Barnard contributed songs; a violin solo was played by Miss Maud Riseley, and the band performed, among other things, the three dances from E. German's music to "Henry VIII."

The two performances of Gilbert and Sullivan's opera, "The Sorcerer," which were given in Clifton on May 23 and 24, by amateurs, were among the best of the kind that have ever taken place in our city. Such highly praiseworthy results could only have been the outcome of careful and earnest study on the part of those who assisted in the gratifying pourtrayal of the opera. The characters were undertaken by Mr. W. E. Young, Mr. J. W. Boddy, Mr. A. Young, Mr. W. D. Goodfellow, Mr. Percy W. Rootham, Mrs. A. Bruce Bedells, Miss Ethel Miller, Mrs. Ashby, Miss Laurie Metcalfe, and Master Hugh Miller. Mr. A. Bruce Bedells was an admirable musical director.

Distributing, on May 28, the certificates won in Bristol in connection with the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music, Mr. John Harvey, the hon. local representative, expressed the hope that more candidates would enter the examination on the next occasion.

The Clifton Amateur Orchestral Society gave its second Concert of the season on May 31, with even better results than those which attended its former performance, the playing of the amateurs being far more firm and finished. Among the contents of the programme were Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Auber's "Masaniello" Overture, Mozart's "Magic Flute" Overture, and a characteristic "Russian" Suite of R. Wuerst. Mr. Harold Barnard was leader and Mr. Edward Pavey, Conductor. Miss Nellie Griffiths and Mr. Sydney Chapman contributed songs.

Twenty-three choirs and 750 singers took part in the Annual Festival of the Bristol Church Choral Union, which was held on the 5th ult. The service book included Stainer's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A, Oliver King's Anthem in F, "I will magnify Thee," and the setting in F, by Berthold Tours, of the Te Deum. Suitable hymns were chosen from various sources. Mr. John Barrett conducted and Mr. George Riseley presided at the organ. Of the many Festivals celebrated by the Union this was by far the best. The singing was in every way magnificent in attack, release, enunciation, phrasing, unity, and tone shading, scarcely a slip being observable throughout the service. Such happy results were thoroughly earned, for singers and Conductor devoted much time and careful attention to preparation. The end surely justified the means.

A diocesan Choral Festival was held on the 5th ult., at St. John's Church, Glastonbury, the choirs taking part being St. John's and St. Benedict's (Glastonbury), Shapwick, Baltonsborough, Wookey Hole, Charlton Mackrell, Street, Butleigh, Ashcott, West Lydford, and Mere. Mr. A. P. Standley conducted. The Festival was a success.

The Burnham Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" on May 29, the results being, in the main, satisfactory. Miss Marion Harris, Miss Ada Sparrow, Mr. Humphrey Jones, and Mr. Montague Worlock were the principal vocalists, and Mr. J. Clifft Wade conducted.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The second Conversazione of the Leinster Section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, which took place at the Antient Concert Rooms on the 8th ult., showed to great advantage the flourishing condition of the Section, which in a few months has developed into vigorous maturity. From a nucleus of twenty-seven original members, whose first meeting was held last November at the house of the late Sir Robert Stewart, the Section has grown into an important assembly of seventy professional musicians, including the professors and examiners of the Universities, Royal Irish Academy of Music, Board of Education, and University Colleges, and the leading vocal and instrumental teachers and performers of Dublin.

The programme of music which the musicians offered to their friends on the 8th ult. consisted entirely of compositions by members of the Section, and was made up of Dr. Culwick's Choral Elegy in memory of Sir Robert Stewart, on words from Milton's "Lycidas"; Sir Robert Stewart's song, "How should'st thou think of me," sung by Miss Alex. Elsner; a quartet for male voices by Mr. W. B. Rooke, entitled "Eventide"; Mr. G. F. Horan's song, "Sunshine," sung by Miss Elsie Connolly; Signor Esposito's Sonata (Op. 32) for pianoforte and violin, played by the composer and Signor Papini; a song and chorus, "In Memoriam," by Doctor José; Papini's song, "Piange con me," sung by Miss Lucy Ashton Hackett; and Stewart's Motet, "In the Lord put I my trust," conducted by Mr. Joseph Robinson. An interesting sketch of the progress of the Society was given by Dr. Joseph Smith, who also announced that the General Conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians would be held in Dublin next January. A short report of the proceedings of the Section showed that six sectional meetings had been held, at each of which a paper on some subject of musical interest was read and discussed, the proceedings usually ending with a performance or trial of some members' compositions.

The annual Pupils' Concert of the Royal Irish Academy of Music took place in the Royal University on the 6th ult.

The several musical appointments of the late Sir Robert Stewart have been filled as follows: by Mr. John Horan, sen., as organist of Christ Church Cathedral; by Mr. Charles Marchant, as organist of Trinity College Chapel, conductor of the Dublin University Choral Society, and professor of the organ at the Royal Irish Academy of Music; by Mrs. Joseph Robinson, as professor of pianoforte, and by Dr. T. R. Jozé, as professor of harmony at same Academy. The Chair of Music at Dublin University has not yet been filled.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

IF the merry month of June has belied its traditional reputation in matters atmospheric, those which are artistic have not been calculated to elevate the musical barometer of the second city. The only relieving feature in a period of abnormal dulness has been the gossip of the streets and correspondence in the local press on the much-vexed question of successorship to Mr. Best at the St. George's Hall organ, and in this respect there have been some lively sallies. The famous instrument has in the meantime been played by Mr. W. H. Jude, with programmes of a decidedly popular order. The Finance Committee, with whom the appointment rests, have so far, however, made no overt sign, though a large number of applications have been received, and it seems probable that, for some time to come at least, no permanent city organist will be selected. The Corporation are acting wisely in thus taking time to think out the matter, and it is to be hoped that in the end the following out of the maxim that "Everything comes to him who waits" will bring about such a solution of this little crisis as will commend itself to all.

While this guerilla warfare is in progress, it is pleasant to note that no dissentient chord has been struck in regard to the Best Memorial Fund, initiated at a public meeting recently called by the Lord Mayor. At the time of writing, about £120 has been subscribed, and a committee formed, which can only be styled national in its comprehensiveness. The latter has relegated the details to an executive fully representative of the amateur and professional domain of music, and consisting of the following gentlemen: Mr. E. Goossens, Mr. H. H. Hornby, Mr. William Oulton, Mr. H. E. Rensburg, Mr. Charles Birchall, Mr. C. J. Bushell, Mr. Von Sobbe, Mr. J. Beausire, Mr. George Behrend, Dr. Edgar Browne, Mr. J. J. Mewburn Levien, Mr. J. C. Sutherland, Mr. J. J. Monk, Mr. W. I. Argent, Mr. Martin Schneider, Mr. Thomas Hughes, Mr. F. H. Burstall, Mr. Franklin Howorth, Mr. James Kendall, and Mr. T. Garnett. To any of the above-named, or to Mr. Ireland, Assistant Secretary, Town Hall, Liverpool, subscriptions may be sent.

The local Mecca of musical pilgrims at this time is Chester, where the fifth Triennial Festival of the present series has been fixed for the 25th inst. and two following days. The works comprised in the scheme of Dr. J. C. Bridge comprise Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," "Hear my Prayer," and "Elijah"; Dr. H. Parry's "Judith" (conducted by the composer), Cherubini's Mass in D minor, Verdi's "Requiem," Handel's "Messiah," and Sullivan's "Golden Legend," together with Dr. Sawyer's "The Soul's Forgiveness," so far as the greater choral efforts are concerned. The Symphonies will be Beethoven's No. 5 in C minor, Schubert's No. 9 in C, and a new one by the Cathedral Organist. The last-named composition consists of six movements suggested by incidents connected with the ancient city, the history of which must surely have proved a happy hunting-ground to Dr. Bridge.

A local choir, that of the Liscard Congregational Church, took the second place, despite the fatigue occasioned by a long journey by road, river, and rail, at the recent Nonconformist Festival at the Crystal Palace, whereupon Mr. Shepherdson, its Conductor, is to be congratulated. The Liverpool Orchestral Society has been the first in the field to map out for the coming season a programme upon which Mr. Rodewald is to be complimented. The Welsh people of Carnarvonshire—at one time strongly opposed to instrumental accessories in connection with divine worship—have proved pioneers of a movement in which an orchestra of fifty performers was announced to be brought together to assist a monster gathering of Congregational singers on the 25th ult. At Llandudno the war of the bands, initiated last year by the late Gwillym Crowe and M. Riviere, is being carried on by the rivalry of the latter Conductor and Mr. A. E. Bartle at the Pavilion and Pier respectively. At the Liverpool Music School the first Symphony Concert was given by the students' orchestra, completed by extraneous wind aid and numbering about forty performers, under Mr. John Ross, on the 21st ult., the chief works being Mozart's "Jupiter" and Beethoven's No. 1 in C, with Mr. F. W. Austin as vocalist.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

OUR readers are aware that some four years ago a movement was started in Manchester which could not fail to excite an interest spreading far beyond that enterprising city and to affect the culture of music in the Northern and Midland counties. In our old Universities the art had lost its old honourable position, and although the power of granting degrees remained, its systematic study formed no part of the recognised curriculum.

The establishment of the Victoria University formed an epoch in the development of schemes of higher education, and its oldest College, in 1891, undertook the responsibility imposed by the charter of providing fit instruction and guidance in all the faculties which the University was empowered to honour. The scheme which after much deliberation was propounded was felt to be such as to insure that, as in other subjects, so in music, the Victoria degrees would not be easily gained. During three sessions those candidates who are admitted to the prescribed course have to attend more than 150 tutorial lectures, covering the whole grammar of musical composition and orchestration. At the close of each academic year their progress is tested by external, as well as by internal examiners. At the close of their work they are subjected to a searching test extending over several days, and within two years are required to submit an original work of proper dimensions and variety. We learn that each year shows the growing popularity of the movement, and that the two students, Marian Millar and Thomas S. Lythgoe, who had completed their exercises in time, and upon whom the Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Ward, on the 30th ult., conferred the degree of Mus.B., will probably have many successors. Regulations for the higher degree of Mus.D. have recently been approved by the University Council. In close connection with the Owens College the Royal Manchester College of Music has been lately established. Its students are not necessarily undergraduates of the University, but arrangements have been made whereby its facilities are placed at the service of aspirants for academical honours.

But side by side with the growth of new and fresh life comes the decay of that which has served its purpose and must give place. It is feared that an old Institution which has played an important part in the maintenance—if not the development—of music in Manchester must shortly lose its home. For many years the Gentlemen's Concerts have lingered on with a waning hold and with an ever-increasing hopelessness, very trying to the directors who, succeeding to an embarrassed heritage, have loyally striven against fate, endeavouring to regain the popularity which long ago departed. But, with a mortgage of £16,000 and a continually dwindling subscription list, it is felt to be impossible to continue the struggle, and a meeting has been held to consider the propriety of accepting an offer—said to be generous—to purchase the concert hall, through the doors of which, some forty years ago, it was so difficult for any but the elect shareholders to force their way. It has been impossible, without regret, to view the waning life of, perhaps, the oldest Institution of the kind in the country. But the wonderful expansion of musical knowledge during the last few years renders impossible the continuance of any system which suited well enough, it may be, narrower and more restricted and exclusive times. The future of art is safe; for it will spring from a root which has energy enough to force its way in spite of all obstacles; rather retarded than aided by a patronage out of keeping with the spirit of the age.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

ALTHOUGH the local concert season is practically closed, the cause of charity does not appeal in vain to vocalists or instrumentalists of this district. On May 31 the scholars of the High School for Girls, at Burslem, gave their initial Concert on behalf of the Haywood Hospital, and Miss Jackson, the head-mistress, and the Misses McMillan and Chadbourne, her colleagues, deserve hearty commendation for their successful efforts. A choir of forty sang with considerable taste and expression Sterndale Bennett's "May Dew," "The Ashgrove," and "The Maypole," under the bâton of Mr. J. A. McGregor (the music-master), and the scholars contributed violin and pianoforte duets and vocal solos, the duet "Angels ever bright and fair," by D. Taylor and N. Bennett, calling for special mention. "Puff," by E. Gibson, was very popular and appropriate. Miss McMillan acted as accompanist, and about £10 will be forwarded to the hospital committee.

Mr. W. Edwards arranged a good programme for the Hanley Hospital Concert, at the Victoria Hall, on the 9th ult. Miss Lilian Hamilton, Mr. T. Cranmer, Mr. H. Pointon, and Mr. B. B. Barlow were the principals, and some pleasing glees were rendered by Messrs. R. Wardle, T. Haynes, W. Haynes, and G. Burgess. The audience was very large and gave hearty applause to the more popular contributions.

The various choral bodies are taking a brief vacation, but Mr. J. Garner, of the Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society, has organised a small choir for the forthcoming Manchester Competition. The selection of Dudley Buck's "Hymn to Music" as the choir's piece will severely test the members—Gaul's "Singers" being the adjudicator's test.

The Examination Board of the North Staffordshire District of the Tonic Sol-fa College met at Hanley, under the presidency of Mr. McGregor (Burslem), on the 16th ult. The Secretary (Mr. C. Oliver) reported that seven certificates had been granted at the last Quarterly Examination. The arrangements for the next Examination concluded the business.

The Meakin Concert Committee have arranged with the Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society to give the first Concert on October 1 at the Victoria Hall. The musical public will be pleased to hear that the electric lighting of the hall is now completed.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

DURING the last year there has been remarkable activity displayed in the way of providing Oxford with opportunities of hearing excellent professional musicians, and the past term has been no exception to the rule. However interesting to people here such Concerts may be, they need nothing more than a record, and it will be sufficient to state that Messrs. Russell and Co. relied on the attractions of Sir Charles and Lady Hallé, Messrs. Acott and Co. depended on Mr. Paderewski, while Mr. Farmer secured the services of Mr. A. Gibson and Miss Fanny Davies for his Concerts at Balliol College, and withal included Beethoven's Septet in his programmes.

A great deal of interest was excited by a Concert given on May 19, in the Sheldonian Theatre, in aid of a local charity, by the English Ladies' Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. J. S. Liddle.

Two local choral societies have given Concerts—Cowley St. John, on May 30, and the Choral and Philharmonic, on the 18th ult. Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" was the main feature of the first-named Society's Concert, and the choruses were capitally sung. Of the band the less said the better, but it is a pity that some reform in this department cannot be instituted. At the Commemoration Concert of the Choral and Philharmonic, Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Nacht" and Alice Mary Smith's "Ode to the North-East Wind" were the choral works, and both were admirably sung. The other important piece in the programme was a selection from Mr. E. German's "Henry VIII." music, admirably played under the composer's bâton.

As far as the University is concerned, College Concerts are a matter of the greatest interest and importance, and they have been numerous this term. Queen's College Concert, May 25, was by far the most important, as no fewer than three works of considerable magnitude were brought to a first performance: a cantata for men's voices and orchestra, called "The Martyrs," by J. H. Maunder; a Ballad for the same combination, "King Henry of Navarre," by Miss Rosalind F. Ellicott; and a Festal Overture by the Conductor of the Society, Dr. F. Iliffe. Anything like adequate criticism of these works is rendered quite impossible by the limits of space; it must suffice to say that all were decidedly successful. If any fault is to be found it would be that Mr. Maunder's cantata ends with an anti-climax and that Miss Ellicott's ballad was too heavily scored; but it is certainly ungracious to find fault with music full of charming and striking ideas. The critic must be excused on the ground that it is a short task to state the faults and would be a very long task to chronicle the merits of the works. The rendering, both by band and chorus, was thoroughly good. The next place must be assigned to the Keble College Concert, on the 14th ult., at which two works, unheard in Oxford before, were performed—Stanford's "Battle of the Baltic" and Parry's Ode "The Glories of our Blood and State." The Society carried its difficult enterprise through with entire success. Two colleges which have been for the last few years under an eclipse, musically speaking, Merton (May 24) and Exeter (May 22), made some effort this year to revive their former successes, and succeeded to a great extent in so doing. Lloyd's "Hero and Leander" and Mendelssohn's "Sons of Art" were the main features of Merton, and F. Cunningham Wood's "Tempest" music and a Serenade by Em. Moór occupied the place of honour at Exeter. The Serenade, which was the only thing like a novelty in the two Concerts, was a very original and remarkable work; and, speaking generally, the two Concerts were a great improvement on recent years. But in each case a more adequate orchestra was wanted. Worcester (May 23) and St. John's (16th ult.) put their trust in Chamber Music and the assistance of amateurs from other colleges, and Magdalen (20th ult.) was, as usual, unequalled with its Madrigal Concert. Concerts of less note, though by no means without merit, were given at Hertford, Jesus, Pembroke, and Brasenose.

The University Musical Union celebrated the close of the first ten years of its existence by giving an invitation Concert in Balliol College Hall, on the 14th ult., when Mendelssohn's Octet for strings and Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet received a most creditable performance at the hands of resident and mostly undergraduate members of the club. When it is added that Sir John Stainer had the curious old music for strings that was cast on the fourth bell of St. Mary's Church in 1612 performed at his Lecture, on the 6th ult., enough has been said to show that musicians in Oxford have not been without interest or occupation in the summer term.

MUSIC IN WILTS AND HANTS.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

ALTHOUGH we are now at the fag end of the Concert season, there are one or two interesting musical events to record.

The Eisteddfod which took place at Southampton, on the 4th ult., aroused considerable interest in the neighbourhood, and was largely attended. Prizes to the value of twenty-five guineas were given for solo and part-singing, and for various instrumental performances. Dr. E. H. Turpin acted as adjudicator, and his awards, which in every case he accompanied with some appropriate and encouraging words, were evidently approved by those present. The arrangements for the gathering were in the hands of Mr. H. M. Pike, Conductor of the Southampton Philharmonic Society, under whose auspices the Eisteddfod was held. It is to be hoped the financial results of the effort were satisfactory, and that the Philharmonic Society will be encouraged to persevere in the excellent work it is capable of doing for the musical education of the people in this town. Miss Jennie Guy and Miss Amy Mortimer have given their annual Concerts during the past month, and secured, in each case, a large amount of support. An Organ Recital was given in St. Mary's Church on the 12th ult., by Mr. Fountain Meen, the Rev. H. P. Trueman being the vocalist.

The tenth triennial Festival of Church Choirs of the Diocese was held in Winchester Cathedral, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 13th and 14th ult., when 1,400 surpliced men and boys, with the addition of a choir of girls also surpliced, took part in the singing. The music for the Festival included a setting of the Te Deum by Professor Stanford and an Evening Service by Dr. Steggall. The anthems were Sir John Goss's "Praise the Lord" and Purcell's "Rejoice in the Lord always." These, together with other portions of the Service, were admirably sung, and it was clear that much care had been bestowed on the training of the choirs. The Festival was under the direction of Dr. Arnold, Organist of Winchester Cathedral.

THE production of a new Symphony by a resident musician is too rare an event not to be interesting, but it becomes doubly so if the composer had not before given any proof of possessing creative talent, though long known as an excellent executive artist and teacher. Such an occasion was Mr. Josef Ludwig's Concert, given at St. James's Hall, on the 5th ult., when a Symphony in F from his pen was performed by a compact but capable orchestra of about fifty players, under the composer's direction and before a large and most appreciative audience. The Symphony is not a revelation of new and great ideas or hitherto undreamt-of beauties. It does not "take us to the edge of the Infinite" or thrill our innermost being with pleasure akin to pain. But it is an enjoyable, interesting work, which reveals on every page a fully equipped musician of refined taste and graceful fancy. Mr. Ludwig's themes are melodious and straightforward, their treatment is generally fresh, and the instrumentation full of colour. In fact, the work sounds well even where the invention flags for a moment and a "reminiscence" makes its appearance. Clearness and conciseness and a healthy optimism, suggestive of Beethoven in a genial mood, are welcome features of the score. Mr. Ludwig and his son, Mr. Paul Ludwig, an excellent violoncellist, played Brahms's ungrateful Double Concerto (Op. 102), and the Concert-giver was also heard to the greatest advantage in Spohr's Sixth Violin Concerto and Paganini's Variations in A minor. Mrs. Hutchinson sang an air by Gluck and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" with appropriate distinction of style and depth of expression, and Professor Stanford conducted Beethoven's "Prometheus" and Cherubini's "Water Carrier" Overtures.

THE Musical Artists' Society's seventieth Concert took place at St. Martin's Town Hall on the 11th ult. The two numbers in which the interest centred were Miss Dora Bright's Pianoforte Quartet in D—a spirited and interesting work which has been heard before at the Musical Guild—and Mr. Erskine Allon's Pianoforte Trio in A. Here we have a composition of which it is a pleasure to speak in terms of high commendation. Mr. Allon's ideas are excellent, sometimes distinctly original; his music interests and delights because it reveals considerable individuality, and is fresh, strong, and beautiful and never dull. The remainder of the programme must be dismissed with a few words. Mrs. George Quirk sang one of Handel's songs, the Queen Vocal Quartet—Misses Amy Sargent, Stanley Lucas, Isabel Wyatt, and Lucie Johnstone—gave an arrangement of Macfarren's "The Sands of Dee" with clear enunciation and excellent ensemble, Mr. Trevelyn David displayed a powerful voice in a sentimental love song by Mr. Barnard, and Madame Mudie-Bolingbroke's sonorous contralto gave due effect to an air by Stradella and Mr. Cowen's "Promise of Life." Miss Carlotta Elliott's singing of two French songs by Goring Thomas and Bizet suffered through imperfect intonation and an inadequate accompaniment, and Herr Belinski played two violoncello pieces by Mr. Alfred Gilbert with good tone and fluent technique.

THE Nonconformist Choir Union's annual Festival was held at the Crystal Palace on the 9th ult. The 4,000 singers mustering on the Handel orchestra for the accustomed Concert included representatives from distant parts of the country as well as from the London districts. Under the watchful direction of Mr. E. Minshall, steady and generally expressive performances were given of Sir Joseph Barnby's anthem "Break forth into joy," "Be not afraid" ("Elijah"), Sullivan's "Hearken unto Me, My people," Tom Cooke's "Strike the Lyre" (arranged by Mr. W. G. NcNaught), Hudson's "I will extol Thee," Stewart's "The Bells of St. Michael's Tower," Schubert's "Forth to the meadows," and other compositions. In the competition for choirs of not less than twenty-six and not more than forty voices, there was no contest and the Emanuel Congregational Church, Dulwich, retained the banner for the second year. There were four entries in the class for choirs of not less than sixteen and not more than twenty-five voices. The winner was the Tonbridge Wesleyan Choir, and the Liscard Congregational Choir was declared a good second. The other competitors were East Finchley Congregational Choir and the Hope Congregational Choir, Denton.

THE London Sunday School Choir's annual gathering at the Crystal Palace, on the 13th ult., was not less successful than either of its twenty-one predecessors. According to the custom of late years there were two Concerts on the Handel orchestra. Early in the afternoon the junior choir of 5,000 voices sang with capital effect hymns and secular pieces, with Mr. J. Rowley as Conductor and Mr. Horace J. Holmes as Organist. Later the adult choir of 4,000 selected voices, with the Crystal Palace and London Sunday School Orchestras, took possession, and gave such esteemed sacred compositions as Clarke-Whitfeld's anthem "I will lift up mine eyes," "Blessed are the men" ("Elijah"), Sir J. Barnby's carol "'Twas in the winter cold" and anthem "It is high time," Gaul's chorus "No shadows yonder," and Smart's "The day is gently sinking." In each of these the prompt observance of light and shade by such a large body of singers was eminently praiseworthy. Mr. Luther Hinton conducted with as much decision as ever, and Mr. David Davies ably presided at the organ. Several orchestral pieces figured in the attractive programme.

MR. DAVID BISPHAM gave a most artistic Concert in St. James's Hall, on the 8th ult., in celebration of the anniversary of Schumann's birth. The programme, which consisted of an excellent selection from the master's vocal and pianoforte compositions, included a number of songs sung by Mr. Bispham, two of them—viz., "Sun of the sleepless" and the fine setting of Byron's "Thy days are done"—being accompanied by the harp, as originally written. The Concert-giver was, however, most successful in the beautiful song "Row gently here" and the "Clown's song" from "Twelfth Night," both of which afforded more opportunities for the exercise of the singer's dramatic perception. The other vocalists were Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marguerite Hall, and Mr. William Shakespeare; the two ladies singing many songs in their most refined and charming style, and Mr. Shakespeare taking part in an admirable performance of the "Spanisches Liederspiel." Miss Fanny Davies played the greater part of the "Davidsbündlertänze" and the Presto in G minor—originally written for the Sonata in that key—Op. 22, the latter being heard on this occasion for the first time in London. It only remains to add that Mr. Bird was the accompanist to show how thoroughly the performers were in sympathy with the music they interpreted.

MADAME ADELINA PATTI introduced to the Albert Hall, on the 2nd ult., Signor Emilio Pizzi's one-act opera "Gabriella," which formed a conspicuous feature of her latest American tour. This work, written expressly for Madame Patti, can neither be said to constitute a valuable addition to modern art nor to display the prima donna's natural gifts to the greatest advantage. The book is conventional, both in idea and in treatment, whilst the music is wanting in freshness and ingenuity of device. There is nothing to attract attention from beginning to end; indeed, it is difficult to imagine a more commonplace production in association with a singer of world-wide reputation. Even Madame Patti, who, by restricting her share in the Concert to the by no means exhaustive work for the heroine in the opera, demonstrated her desire to do her best for the composer, could not quicken enthusiasm for "Gabriella." Other parts were taken by Miss Lily Moody, Herr Kaufmann, Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, and Mr. Franklin Clive; and Signor Pizzi conducted. Some miscellaneous pieces, given by Miss Frida Scotta, Mr. Norman Salmond, and others, furnished the first part.

THE following is the revised programme for the Hereford Festival: September 11, morning, "Elijah." September 12, morning, Dvorák's "Requiem" Mass, Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and Dr. Bridge's "The Cradle of Christ"; evening, Bach's "Christmas" Oratorio (parts 1 and 2) and Haydn's "Creation" (parts 1 and 2). September 13, morning, Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Bethlehem" (part 2), Wagner's Vorspiel to "Parsifal," Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, and Spohr's "Last Judgment"; evening, Dr. C. H. Parry's "Job" and "Hymn of Praise." September 14, morning, "The Messiah." In the Shire Hall, September 11, a miscellaneous Concert, including Dr. Lloyd's new cantata, "Sir Ogie and the Lady Elsie," will be given; and on the 14th, a Chamber Concert. The following artists have been engaged: Madame Albani, Miss Evangeline Florence, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Agnes Wilson, Miss Jessie King, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Edwin Houghton, Mr. Santley, Mr. Plunket Greene, Mr. Robert Grice, and Mr. Watkin Mills. Conductor, Mr. J. T. R. Sinclair.

THE anniversary Festival Services of the London Gregorian Choral Association, founded in 1870, were held on the 7th ult., at St. Mark's, Marylebone Road, with the Sarum Ritual; the Church of St. Edmund, King and Martyr, Lombard Street, the music including the "Missa de Cruce"; and in the evening at St. Paul's Cathedral, when the growth of the movement was distinctly proved by the fact that nearly 1,400 choristers took part in the last-named service. The employment of brass and percussion instruments in the processional hymns is certainly not to be wholly condemned; but the effects were at times too noisy, and rather suggestive of the Salvation Army. The combination of plain-song with modern music, however, showed clearly that the Association is not by any means narrow in its views, the anthem being a new and effective composition, "All Thy works praise Thee, O Lord," by Sir Joseph Barnby, conducted by the composer; and the organ voluntaries, played by Dr. Warwick Jordan, who, as in previous years, had trained the choirs, including movements by Rheinberger and De Lange.

MISS TRASK'S Choir, an amateur association, gave its second Concert, on the 13th ult., at Princes' Hall, and selected Max Bruch's "Lay of the Bell," introduced to the metropolis a few weeks before by the Laistner Choir. In each of the choral numbers evidence was afforded of careful training and of regard for expression, every wish of Miss Trask, who ably conducted, receiving satisfactory response. Indeed, if a little more confidence had been shown in the matter of attack the performance of the choir would have earned commendation throughout, more particularly as the instrumental support yielded by a pianoforte and harmonium was not of the best. Miss Esther Palliser, Mr. J. Robertson, and Mr. Andrew Black were responsible for the principal solos. The cantata was preceded by Schumann's Quartet in E flat (Op. 47), played with judgment by Miss Trask (pianoforte), Miss Edina Bligh (violin), Mr. Alfred Hobday (viola), and Mr. W. H. Squire (violoncello).

THE Chaplin Trio, consisting of young ladies who respectively play the pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, successfully gave a Chamber Concert in the small Queen's Hall on the 19th ult. Eduard Schütt's Trio in C minor (Op. 27) provided excellent opportunity for gauging their efficiency, and the interpreters did not disappoint expectation. Their performance was marked by spirit, evenness, and unanimity of expression. In Dvorák's Quintet in A major (Op. 81) they were associated with Madame Anna Lang and Miss Rosabel Watson. In the first movement of a Concerto for violin by Lindner, and in Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," Miss Mabel Chaplin displayed command of the resources of the instrument, and in the last-named piece was encored. The neat rendering, by Miss Kate Chaplin, of an aria and gavotte by Vieuxtemps and of Godard's "Adagio Pathétique" also won hearty approval. Miss Evelyn Ehrmann (a pianist) and the Meister Glee Singers also appeared.

THE London Organ School and International College of Music Students' Concert took place in the Queen's Hall, on the 13th ult., under the conductorship of Dr. G. J. Bennett. The band, of about ninety performers, boasting an admirable force of strings, earned much approval for the firmness and crispness with which Beethoven's "Prometheus," Brüll's "Macbeth," and Reissiger's "Die Felsenmühle" Overtures were given. Excellent, too, was the rendering of Moszkowski's Suite "From Foreign Parts" and the ballet music from Rubinstein's "Feramors." More than ordinary ability was exhibited by the organ students. Miss Edroff particularly distinguished herself by a finished performance of the Toccata from Widor's Fifth Symphony, and there was special merit in Mr. Herbert Swain's interpretation of Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G minor. The Misses Philips, Whomes, C. Bravington, and Lelia Smith were prominent among the pianists, and Mrs. Hehner and Miss Adelaide Gibson were tasteful vocalists.

MISS CÉCILE HARTOG'S skill, both as song-composer and as pianoforte executant, was demonstrated at Princes' Hall, on the 12th ult., when she obtained vocal assistance from Mrs. Mary Davies (with "The Year's at the Spring"), Mrs. Helen Trust, Mr. Andrew Black, and others. The Concert-giver joined Miss Frances Thomas and Mr. W. E. Whitehouse in Brahms's Trio for clarinet, pianoforte, and violoncello; was associated with Miss Ida Rubinstein in Reinecke's "Impromptu" duet for two pianofortes on a theme from Schumann's "Manfred"; and, as solos, played with fluency and appropriate feeling pieces by Schumann and Chopin. Master Arthur Argiewicz stirred the audience to enthusiasm by his brilliant performance of Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen," and a charming Barcarolle for clarinet, by Miss Hartog, was played in finished style by Miss Thomas.

MR. CHARLES LUNN'S Lecture at the St. Martin's Town Hall, on "Voice Training: Past, Present, and Future," contained many suggestive remarks and valuable hints to singers. The properly-trained vocalist was described as the master of his forces; the badly-trained singer as practically a cripple. Referring to Mr. Manuel Garcia as a vocal teacher, Mr. Lunn said: "I have no words sufficiently strong to express the great gratitude I feel towards that eminent man for what he has done." Artistic taste was defined as the anxious yearning after an unknown truth; feeling as an inner state of consciousness; expression as the active manifestation by a method of that inner consciousness; and emotion as the bodily equivalent of feeling. Two of Mr. Lunn's pupils, by their singing, testified to the results obtainable by the practical adoption of the principles advanced.

As usual at this season of the year, Concerts have been given during the past month in bewildering number. Amongst those which deserve record were Miss Lily Heale's, given on the 13th ult., in the small Queen's Hall; Miss Violet Nicholson's, which took place in the same hall, on the 23rd ult.; Madame Leo de Broc's second Concert-Lecture, in St. James's Small Hall, on the 21st ult.; Mr. John Thomas's Annual Harp Concert, held in St. James's Hall, on the 23rd ult., when the celebrated harpist was admirably assisted by a number of his pupils and several well known vocalists; the excellent Concert given by Mr. Moberly's String Orchestra, at St. James's Hall, on May 25; the Pianoforte Recitals given by Miss Geselschap, on May 31, Miss Margaret Wild on the 21st ult., and Mr. Leonard Borwick, on the 12th ult.; the Violin Concert given by Mr. Duloup, on May 28, and the Pianoforte and Violin Recital of Miss Mathilde Verne and Miss Ethel Barns, which took place on the 15th ult., at St. James's Hall.

MISS F. HELENA MARKS at her Recital at Steinway Hall, on May 30, had the advantage of Mr. Hans Wessely's services in a programme of pianoforte and violin compositions. Their talents were united in Beethoven's Sonata in F for the two instruments, in Grieg's Sonata in F, and in Schubert's Duet (Op. 162), each of which was given with adequate spirit and expression. Miss Marks evinced considerable intelligence and executive finish in her rendering of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B flat, in Scarlatti's Sonata in D, in pieces by Handel and Chopin, and more particularly in Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 31, No. 2). The pianist's performances throughout merited the commendation they received. Freedom, breadth, and neatness marked Mr. Hans Wessely's playing of Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen."

ON the 17th ult., at the close of the afternoon service at St. Paul's Cathedral, an interesting presentation was made of two handsome timepieces to Messrs. Robert Raynham Weed and Thomas Hanson, on their retirement, after many years of service, from the Cathedral Choir. In the unavoidable absence of the Precentor (Canon Scott-Holland), Mr. Fred. Walker, the senior Vicar-Choral, made the presentation, and expressed on behalf of himself and the other members of the Cathedral staff the regret experienced at the severance of the connection between them and their late colleagues. He was sure they would feel gratified to know that not only were the members of the choir represented in this practical expression of good feeling, but also the whole of the Cathedral clergy and a few friends formerly connected with St. Paul's.

THE Queen Victoria series of Lectures at Trinity College London, have been given this term by Mr. Walter Macfarren, who chose for his subject, "The Pianoforte: its Origin and Development." Mr. Macfarren's long experience as a professor of the pianoforte at the Royal Academy of Music, and his personal acquaintance with so many famous pianoforte composers and executants, combined with his knowledge and research, peculiarly fitted him to deal with such a subject, and enabled him to invest it with great interest and attractiveness. The educational object of these Lectures was also kept well in view and the musical illustrations, all of which were played by the lecturer, included characteristic excerpts, chronologically arranged, from the time of Haydn.

MISS FREDERIKA B. TAYLOR'S vocal ability was manifested in several songs, on the 7th ult., at her Concert in the small Queen's Hall. Her initial essay was Rode's "Air with Variations"—not a happy choice for these days—to which she did as much justice as the trivial effusion deserves. Mdlle. Jeanne de Fortis sang with taste Tosti's "Si tu le voulais" and Gounod's "Biondina" (No. 6), and Mr. Braxton Smith acquitted himself satisfactorily in Blumenthal's "An Evening Song." An artistic reading of Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 5, No. 2) in E minor for pianoforte and violoncello was given by Mdlle. Douste de Fortis and Herr Carl Fuchs, to whom solo pieces were also assigned.

MR. HENRY R. A. ROBINSON'S annual vocal and instrumental Concert took place at the Rink Hall, Blackheath, on the 7th ult. The programme included Chopin's Duet for two pianofortes, played by the Concert-giver and his pupil, Miss Jessie Slader; the little known Trio (Op. 8) by Chopin, admirably played by Mr. Robinson, Mr. H. Tolhurst, and Mr. J. Norman, the Scherzo and Adagio being especially applauded; and the Finale from Gade's Trio (Op. 42). The Andante Spianato and Grand Polonaise of Chopin served to display Mr. Robinson's brilliant playing. The vocalists were Madame Ida Everard, Miss Helena Watkis, Mr. Henry Lindsey, and Mr. R. E. Miles.

MISS MARGARET FORD, a sub-professor at the Royal Academy of Music, presented an attractive programme at her Concert in St. Martin's Town Hall, on May 29. She played several pianoforte pieces, including a Ballade by Mr. Oscar Beringer, with marked delicacy, and exhibited capability for a loftier flight by the correct spirit characterising her delivery, with Miss Ethel Barns, of the "Kreutzer" Sonata. The tasteful rendering by Miss Kate Cove of two songs by Mr. Walter Macfarren, who accompanied her, was a highly successful feature, and songs by Miss Laura Lemon were expressively given by Mr. Arthur Thompson.

THE annual Concert of the students of the London Academy of Music took place at St. James's Hall, on the 13th ult. The band, under Mr. Pollitzer's direction, gave a performance of two movements from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Overtures by Weber and Nicolai. Two young violin students, Alice Maud Liebmann and Maurice Alexander, played Bach's double Concerto, and Harold Samuels played the first movement of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, all three acquitting themselves with credit to their instructors. Miss Margaret Nutter, Miss Mabel Calkin, Mr. Gilbert Denis, and Mr. Mervyn Dene appeared successfully as vocalists.

THE attention of those interested in the higher education of choirboys of cathedrals and churches may well be directed to the election for the Goss Scholarship tenable at the Royal Academy of Music for three years from next Michaelmas term. The election will take place at the Royal College of Organists on the 28th inst., the Council of that Institution having the presentations to the Scholarship in their hands. The opportunity of a complete musical training at the Royal Academy presents splendid advantages; and it may be noted that several previous holders of the Goss Scholarship have secured prominent positions in the musical world.

THE South Hampstead Orchestra gave its ninth annual Concert at the Hampstead Conservatoire. Brahms's "Academical Festival" Overture and two movements from Goetz's Symphony were played with remarkable spirit and feeling. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony and the "Leonora" (No. 3) Overture were also included in the programme. Miss Louise Phillips and Mr. Bispham were the vocalists, and Mrs. Marshall once more displayed her skill and ability in conducting a very successful performance.

A VOCAL Recital was given by Miss Agnes Walker at St. Peter's Hall, Brockley, on the 7th ult. The compass and flexibility of the Concert-giver's voice were displayed in the aria "O luce di quest anima," and she sang "For the sake of the past" and "Through sunny Spain" with much sweetness and expression. Miss Walker was assisted by Miss F. Coles, Mr. E. N. Davis, Mr. Leonard Curtis (pianoforte), and Master Tom Fussell (violin). Mr. R. Frederic Tyler accompanied.

A MEMORIAL window to the late Duke of Clarence was unveiled by the Duchess of Teck in Berkeley Chapel, Mayfair, on May 27. The music selected for the occasion included Dr. G. M. Garrett's Magnificat in F and Dr. J. F. Bridge's Meditation (composed for Robert Browning's funeral), "He giveth His beloved sleep." The whole service was well rendered, the new organ, in the hands of the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. Arthur Bly, proving very effective.

ON Sunday afternoon, the 10th ult., Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given at St. James's, Paddington, by a specially augmented choir numbering about eighty voices. Miss Florence Monk and Mr. Gilbert Denis sang the soprano and tenor solos, the former being joined by Miss Barratt in the duet "I waited for the Lord." Mr. W. Attersol conducted, and Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, Organist of the Church, played the organ accompaniments. The collection was in aid of the Hospital Sunday Fund.

A DRAMATIC and musical Recital was given at Queen's Hall, on the 16th ult., by Miss Madge Irving, assisted by Herr Bonawitz. Miss Irving may be specially congratulated on her rendering of Tennyson's "First Quarrel," with musical accompaniment played by Mrs. Cunnah, which added greatly to the effect of the recitation. Herr Bonawitz gave three pianoforte solos in his usual masterly style, and Miss Olive Grey and Mr. Russen were the vocalists.

THE Kyrle Choir, under Mr. F. A. W. Docker, performed "Elijah" at Holy Trinity, Leytonstone, on May 30, the soloists being Miss Regina Atwater, Miss Rina Robinson, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Arthur Appleby. On the 6th ult. the "Creation" was given at the Free Christian Church, Kentish Town. The soloists were Mrs. Edwards, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Albert Orme. Dr. Turpin presided at the organ.

THE Choral Society of the Anglo-German School of Music, West Norwood, gave Cowen's cantata "The Rose Maiden," with orchestral accompaniment, at the Lecture Hall, Streatham Hill, on May 29. The soloists were Miss Marian Morrell, Miss Edith Appleyard, Mr. Otto Dene, Mr. H. J. Agar, and Mr. C. Philcox. Mr. Lawrence Fryer proved an admirable Conductor. The second half of the programme was miscellaneous.

MISS IDA MEYNELL gave a Concert at Collard's Pianoforte Rooms, on the 12th ult. The Concert-giver, whose singing of songs by Tosti and Molloy met with hearty applause, was assisted by Signorina Gambogi, Mdlle. Noemi Lorenzi, Miss Florence Christie, Mr. Claude Ravenhill, Mr. David Wilson, Mr. Gabriel Thorp, Mrs. Ravenhill and Miss Annie Nugent (pianoforte), Miss Edith Drake (æola), and Miss Violet Anns (recitation).

MISS LILIAN MURRAY gave an evening Concert, at the Hampstead Conservatoire of Music, on the 14th ult. Her solos were the "Habanera," from "Carmen," and "Scenes that are brightest," from "Maritana," for each of which she received an encore. Miss Murray was assisted by Miss Maud Purcell, Mr. William James, Madame Costa (pianoforte), Madame Mylius (harp), and Herr Jan Mulder (violoncello). Mr. Robertson Webb accompanied.

MR. HARVEY LÖHR gave his ninth annual Concert in Princes' Hall, on the 15th ult., when he engaged the assistance of a number of well-known artists, whose performances gave much enjoyment to a numerous audience. As on previous occasions, the programme included several excellent specimens of the Concert-giver's abilities as a vocal composer.

MASTER GRANVILLE ARCHER HILL, of Manchester, gave two Organ Recitals, on the 15th ult., at the Crystal Palace. Master Hill, who gained the diploma of Associate of the Royal College of Organists at the age of fifteen, showed surprising command over the instrument, and his efforts evoked hearty applause.

A HARP Recital was given by Mr. and Mrs. Aptommas, the well-known harpists (who have just returned from a tour in the United States), at Marlborough Rooms, on May 29.

OBITUARY.

WE regret to have to announce the death, on the last day of May, of a gentleman who for many years had exercised a very powerful influence in a musical centre of great activity. Mr. GEORGE FREEMANTLE was born at Ely in the May of 1833; but some five years later his father became a member of the Durham Choir, and in that city (then celebrated for the excellence of its Cathedral music) the boy received his early training. Whatever may, in past days, have been the balance between the advantages and drawbacks of chorister life, there is no doubt that often an intense love of art and a strong feeling of self-reliance were kindled, and that a foundation was laid—perhaps on somewhat narrow lines—for the building up of a firm judgment concerning the principles of choral and Church music. Early in life the lad was placed under the especial care of the then Cathedral organist—Mr. Henshaw—a sound accompanist of the old school. In 1854 Mr. Freemantle was appointed director of the music at Henshaw's Blind Asylum in Manchester, an institution wherein he earnestly exerted himself to give a practical character to the training of the inmates and to develop whatever talent came under his care. Severing his connection with the Asylum, Mr. Freemantle, at the old Mechanics' Institution, initiated what was practically the first systematic school of music in the city; and he accepted an engagement as Organist of the chapel in Cross Street, then well known as the headquarters of the Unitarian body—a step which effectually barred the way to the gratification of his very natural and laudable ambition to follow his old master in the control of music in St. Cuthbert's Cathedral. About that time, a firm friend and zealous pupil, Mr. (afterwards Sir) T. Sebastian Bazley, facilitated a change of career which, henceforth, connected Mr. Freemantle more with commercial life than with the work of private teaching. But the stimulus which he had previously given to the song of the Blind Asylum he was now in a position to spread over a larger area. The public criticism of music in Manchester greatly needed a stringent reform. Always essentially amateurish and narrow, it had become thoroughly contemptible; and it was a happy instinct in the minds of the proprietors of the Manchester Guardian which led them to avail themselves of a singularly fortunate opportunity to raise it above so lamentable a condition. Mr. Freemantle's education fitted him to speak authoritatively upon matters concerning which his predecessors had been able only to retail the cant of the day: and the severance of all personal pecuniary interest in musical undertakings raised our friend above any suspicion of bias or unfairness. Always strongly impulsive, self-reliant, and enthusiastic, his first utterances may frequently not have commended themselves to his calmer and more considered judgment. Amid the excitement of a Festival week, for example, more than once a verdict was recorded which afterthought scarcely confirmed. But there was a remarkable power to brush away prejudice, to enlarge the scope of a judgment gradually expanding beyond the limits of early training, and to appreciate merit of kinds not previously recognised. And, in addition, there was a warm-heartedness and a wealth of sympathy with trouble of every kind—and particularly with the struggles of musicians—which endeared him to a very wide circle of friends. By the death of George Freemantle the orchestral players of Manchester have lost an untiring advocate of their claims, and the help of one ever ready to work for their benefit and to contribute to their welfare.

We regret to have to announce the following deaths:—

JAMES GREENWOOD, one of the oldest and most esteemed professional musicians and teachers in Bristol, at his residence, White Ladies' Road, Clifton, aged fifty-seven. The deceased, who was a pupil of Dr. S. S. Wesley, had been organist at various churches, and music-master at Colston School and at the Grammar School. He was a great advocate of the Lancashire Sol-fa and wrote a treatise on it for Novello's Primer Series, to which he also contributed a collection of 396 Two-part Exercises. His compositions include services, anthems, &c. He did much good and useful work in Bristol, where his loss will be deeply felt.

WILLIAM HILLS, who died at the Hermitage, Bishop's Stortford, on the 5th ult., at the advanced age of eighty-one, had been for a great many years a very successful teacher, in spite of an incurable deafness. He was an accomplished German scholar and supplied excellent translations to a great number of German songs by Mendelssohn, Mozart, Beethoven, and others. He also published a collection of 105 Rounds and Canons, some vocal trios, &c.

E. Thoinan, author of a number of valuable books on musical subjects, amongst which "Les origines de la Chapelle-musique des souverains de France" and "Les origines de l'opéra français" (written in conjunction with M. Charles Nuitter) are perhaps the most noteworthy. His real name was Ernest Roquet.

Professor Immanuel Gottlob Faisst, composer of songs, choruses, cantatas, and a conductor of distinction. In 1857 he became professor of organ playing and composition at the Stuttgart Conservatoire, which he helped to found, and of which he afterwards became director. He also edited, with Professor Lebert, the well-known Cotta edition of the pianoforte works of the classics. He died at Stuttgart on the 5th ult., aged seventy.

Frl. Stella Naht, pianist, on May 29, at Berlin.

Enrico Masi, an excellent violinist, formerly a member of the famous Becker "Florentine" Quartet, and afterwards of the Quartetto Romano, directed by Signor Sgambati. He was also a Secretary in the musical department of the Ministry of Public Instruction, and, as such, the author of highly appreciated articles on matters relating to his art. He died at Rome, aged forty-eight.

Giannini Sisco, baritone, in Pernambuco (Brazil), of yellow fever.

Alberto Cherubini, teacher of music, at Sassari, aged ninety. He was no relation to his great namesake.

Carl Zeuner, conductor of several choral societies in Geneva, on May 25, at Cairo, aged fifty.

THE HYMN TO APOLLO.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In the description of one of the Delphic hymns to Apollo in The Musical Times for June there are some statements and assumptions which can hardly be maintained.

Speaking of the notation, the writer says that "of the fourteen signs used, twelve belong to the Phrygian notation as given by Alypius." Twelve of them belong to the notation for Phrygian Chromatics; but only ten of them belong to the notation for Phrygian Diatonics, and Alypius does not recognise a Phrygian scale as such. Just afterwards the writer says that "A natural is part of the chromatic genus of the Phrygian scale." He employs A natural to represent one of the twelve signs already mentioned; and the remark would be equally true of the other eleven. Again, he says that "D flat belongs to the conjunct tetrachord of the Phrygian scale." The conjunct tetrachord is not the same in Phrygian Chromatics and Phrygian Diatonics. And similarly he speaks of the Hyper-Phrygian scale, as though chromatics and diatonics were unknown.

The writer accepts M. Reinach's transcript without any reservations; but there really are very good reasons for doubting whether the majority of the notes are exactly in their proper places.

Alypius sets down five-and-forty scales, with a letter for every note; and by comparing these scales together we obtain his method of lettering. The common letters of the alphabet are taken in their natural order from A to Ω. Next beyond the Ω there is a modified A beginning the alphabet again with every letter modified. And next before the common A there is a modified Ω finishing an alphabet with another set of modifications. But this last alphabet omits the letters Η, Ρ, Σ.

In the following list the capital letters are those that Alypius assigns to the Phrygian chromatic scale in order of descent, while the small letters are those that are omitted in this scale:—Μ′, ν, ξ, ο, τ, υ, φ, Χ, ϡ, ϖ, α, β, Γ, δ, ε, ζ, Η, Θ, Ι, Κ, Λ, Μ, ν, ξ, ο, π, ρ, σ, Τ, Υ, Φ, χ, ψ, ω, α, β, γ, ∇, F, Ζ, η, θ, ⊨.

The following is M. Théodore Reinach's transcript, as published in the Bulletin de Correspondance Hellénique, vol. 17, p. 591:—

This transcript assigns the letters I and K to one and the same note, D natural; and that cannot be right. Assuming for the present that M and I denote C natural and D natural, Λ and K must belong to two notes in between. And if these notes are placed symmetrically at intervals of one-third of a tone, we get precisely what Aristoxenus calls a Soft Chromatic; the first three notes of the tetrachord being separated by intervals of a third of a tone apiece. Aristoxenus, p. 50, ed. Meibom, — μαλακοῦ μὲν οὖν χρώματος ἐστι διαίρεσις, ἐν ᾗ τὸ μὲν πυκνὸν ἐκ δύο χρωματικῶν διέσεων ἐλαχίστων σύγκειται, κ.τ.λ.—cf. p. 46—τὸ τρίτον μέρος, ὃ καλεῖται δίεσις χρωματικὴ ἐλαχίστη. This deranges the tetrachord that M. Reinach puts in the lower line. And each of the four remaining tetrachords begins in the same way with three consecutive notes, so the presumption is that the E naturals and E flats and the A naturals and A flats are disturbed by the same error as the D natural and D flat; the result being that ten of these eighteen notes are not exactly in their places. This would vitiate the transcript of the hymn itself in seven of the twelve letters that are used with Phrygian Chromatics. The other two letters are O and B, and there is a similar difficulty about the B. This is assigned to G flat; but if ϖ and Γ denote G natural and F natural, A must come between as well as B. The O is assigned to B natural. And here we have to face another set of doubts about the six remaining letters.

Taking the letters in the sequence shown above, the transcript gives C for letter 1, D for letter 4, G for letter 13, B for letter 19, C for letter 22, D for letter 25, F for letter 31, G for letter 34, and C for letter 43. So this portion of the transcript is made on the assumption that every third letter represents a natural; and two letters are left in every interval between a pair of naturals, whether the interval be major tone, minor tone, or semitone. There is certainly a presumption that, when there were twenty-one notes within the octave, each of the seven original notes was followed by two supplementary notes; but there is no reason for supposing that the seven notes were exactly in the places assigned to them in the modern tempered scale. The history of the ancient scale is too large a subject for discussion here; and the discussion would really be fruitless, as there is no saying to which sect of musicians or what period the hymn must be assigned.

M. Reinach's transcript is the best that can be made with our modern notation; and it serves to give a notion of the music. But people are making a mistake if they imagine that it puts them into a position to form a critical opinion about the merits of the piece.

The transcript bears the words "Composed about 278 B.C." There is certainly an allusion to the miraculous repulse of the Gauls from Delphi in 279 B.C.; so the hymn was not composed before. But it may have been composed long afterwards.—Yours, &c., Cecil Torr.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I was exceedingly interested to find in your last issue a transcript of the recently published "Hymn to Apollo." The genuine relics of Greek music are so few that any addition to the number becomes, from any point of view, a matter of importance; but in the present case this is more particularly so, inasmuch as the composition presents features which do not occur in any other of the extant specimens.

I have been especially struck with the use of the note O (represented in modern notation by middle B). It has been suggested to me by a gentleman admirably qualified to pronounce an opinion, that the note is explainable on the assumption of a temporary modulation into another of the keys given by Alypius; but this does not meet the difficulty, except, perhaps, in the passage where it first appears:—

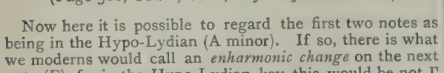
Now here it is possible to regard the first two notes as being in the Hypo-Lydian (A minor). If so, there is what we moderns would call an enharmonic change on the next note (F), for in the Hypo-Lydian key this would be not Γ but E, and a distinct thing to an ancient Greek, though we have but one note corresponding to the two. This in itself is something new, for it has hitherto been supposed that a Greek modulation should be through a note common to both keys. Still, we cannot say it is impossible, and, so far, the explanation may hold.

But let us go on to Col. 2, Sc. 8:—



The first bar in Hyper-Phrygian (four flats) in the chromatic genus, is itself, of course, a modulation from the original Phrygian (three flats). In the second bar, on O, we are suddenly plunged into the Hypo-Lydian (though the previous note M does not occur in the Hypo-Lydian scale); and we are then, with equal suddenness, dragged back on K into the Hyper-Phrygian! For K and the succeeding notes are again foreign to the Hypo-Lydian.

The question therefore arises: Were the Greeks accustomed to modulate, in this breakneck fashion, into a somewhat remote key for the duration of one note only? Such things certainly occur in modern music, where harmonies belonging to foreign keys are struck without preparation, and as suddenly quitted again without having time to really establish a new key at all. But is such a course at all consistent with simple unisonous vocal melody, or do Greek writers give us the slightest hint that there was any such practice so long ago? Would it not entirely stultify the system of Greek notation, with its numerous subtle distinctions, and would it not have involved its early destruction or simplification? These questions, Sir, and others which seem to spring therefrom, may perhaps be worthy of an expert opinion from some of your readers.

It is somewhat peculiar that, looked at through modern notation, and with modern harmonic views, there is nothing very remarkable about the Hymn; but that it presents curious difficulties when considered through Greek notation and the Greek system of tetrachords. Can it be possible that this is due to any process of "restoration"?—I am, Sir, Yours obediently,

ERNEST BERGHOLT.

London, June 6, 1894.

["Metabolē" (Modulation) of various kinds is so frequently alluded to by Greek theorists, that it seems to have been a very favourite device. The description of Metabolē in Arist. Quint., p. 25, points strongly to the use of equal temperament. We have seen the photogravure of the stones. No restoration has taken place such as that suggested by our correspondent.—ED. M. T.]

"WHEN DOCTORS DIFFER—"

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you allow me through your columns to ask if any of your readers can tell at what date the terms con sordini and senza sordini were first applied to the pianoforte? When applied to instruments which have "mutes" the terms have their perfectly clear meaning; and doubtless they were at first used only for these instruments, and applied afterwards to the pianoforte. Senza sordini is generally understood in pianoforte music to mean "without dampers" (i.e., with a free use of the right pedal), and con sordini to mean "with dampers" (i.e., without the right pedal). We have in the first movement of Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata a familiar and easily accessible example of the use of the term senza sordini; and most of us can recall renderings of this work by the eminent pianists of the day and their practice in this particular. It is therefore much to be regretted that text-books used for teaching purposes, and having a wide circulation, should give varied explanations of these terms. In Davenport's "Elements of Music" (on page 39) we are told that senza sordini means "the right foot or damper pedal," and we are left to conclude that if senza sordini means "without dampers," con sordini must mean with them.

In the "Trinity College Text-Book," Part 1 (on page 88), we are told that con sordini means the left pedal, and that senza sordini means without it; and we are further warned not to confuse mutes with dampers. In Stainer and Barrett's "Dictionary of Musical Terms," con sordini is said to mean "the left pedal," and senza sordini "the right pedal." As Davenport's little book is published "under the authority of the Committee of the Royal Academy," and the "Trinity College Text-Book" is published "under the authority of that body," the inference is that teachers sending their pupils in for examination must, in preparing for success with the Royal Academy, teach one thing; and in preparing for success with Trinity College, teach another; while Stainer and Barrett's Dictionary—a handy book for the general seeker after information—will imbue the un-examined public with a different version still. It seems to me most likely that the terms were first applied to the pianoforte in the early days of the instrument, when it had but one pedal, and when but one signification could be gathered from them. Some definite evidence would probably be valued by many pianoforte players, as well as by—Yours faithfully,

C. H. ROBINSON.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BECKENHAM, KENT.—Sir Joseph Barnby, speaking on May 26, at the School of Music, said he hoped that parents would realise the advantages accruing to their children from the study of music. It was the purest art, for it could not be demoralised by base uses, as literature and pictorial and plastic arts could be. The more time that was devoted to the civilising influences of music, the better it would be for all. He protested against the attempts being made to bring about registration of musical professors, believing that English parents would refuse to be coerced by Act of Parliament into sending their children to particular men.

BEDFORD.—Under the skilful conductorship of Mr. H. A. Harding and the able management of Mr. C. St. Amory, excellent operatic performances were given from May 22 to the 1st ult. of Flotow's "Martha" and Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana." The principal characters in the former work were effectively impersonated by Miss A. Spacksman, Miss M. Thomas, Mr. W. Green, Mr. J. Sandbrook, and Mr. D. Carberry; and in the latter by Miss C. Russell, Miss L. Fulton, Mrs. A. Allen, Mr. H. Piercy, and Mr. E. Beaman. The amateur chorus and orchestra did their work well, and great credit is due to the promoters of the undertaking for the successful manner in which the scheme was carried out.

Bournemouth.—Dr. Lemare gave an interesting and instructive Lecture on the 16th ult., in Arnold College, on the "Historical Development of Music from the earliest period to the present time," the musical illustrations being given by the lecturer, Miss Lemare, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Spencer, and several of Dr. Lemare's pupils.

Brentwood.—Mr. Westlake Morgan gave an Organ Recital at the Church of St. Thomas the Martyr, on the 15th ult., on the fine organ recently built by Messrs. Norman Bros. and Beard, of Norwich.

Brighton.—Sir Arthur Sullivan's Oratorio "The Light of the World" was given in the Dome, by the Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society, on the 21st ult., as the second Concert of its forty-eighth season. The principals were Miss Mabel Berrey, Miss Emily Himing, Mr. Braxton Smith, and Mr. Charles Phillips, all of whom rendered their respective parts in a most efficient manner, and the orchestra and chorus, numbering over 200, gave an excellent account of their share in the Oratorio. Mr. W. A. Baker led the orchestra, Mr. Percy Starnes was the organist, and Mr. Robert Taylor conducted.——Mr. Frederick Corder's new cantata for female voices, "Margaret," founded on Longfellow's poem "The Blind Girl of Castèl-Cuillè," was produced on the 22nd ult. by the students of the Brighton School of Music, in the Athenæum Hall, before a crowded audience. The many beauties of this charming work were well brought out by Miss M. Grounds as Margaret, Miss H. B. Taylor as Jane, and the ladies' choir of the school, numbering about fifty voices; Miss E. L. Bell was the accompanist, and Mr. Robert Taylor conducted. The composer, who was present, was enthusiastically applauded. A miscellaneous selection, which preceded the performance of the cantata, was well rendered by pupils of Mr. Kuhe, Mr. Corder, Herr Stern, Mr. R. Taylor, Dr. King, and others, the Overtures to "Coriolanus" and "Ruy Blas" by the orchestra being especially worthy of praise.——On Saturday, the 23rd ult., at the Royal Pavilion, Mr. W. Kuhe was presented with a testimonial and address, on the occasion of the attainment of his seventieth birthday. The presentation took the form of a cheque for 450 guineas, subscribed by his many friends and admirers from all parts of the country. The Mayor, Dr. Ewart, made the presentation.

Christchurch, New Zealand.—The first Concert of the Musical Union since the amalgamation of the Christchurch Musical and Orchestral Societies took place on May 11, in the Tuam Street Hall, and was attended by a crowded audience. The performances included Haydn's Symphony in D, known as "The Clock"; Edward German's three Dances from the incidental music to "Henry VIII."; and the ballet music from Rubinstein's opera "Feramors." The vocalists were Mrs. Westmacott and Mr. Millar. Mr. A. J. Merton played the accompaniments to the vocal numbers, and Mr. Wallace, who conducted, gave an excellent rendering of the solo part of Spohr's "Scena Cantante," entrusting the bâton during this performance to Mr. H. H. Laughnan.

Dalbeattie, Dumfriesshire.—The Synod Choir Union held its fourth musical Festival on the 9th ult. in the Parish Church. The primary object of the Association is to impart a higher and more finished tone to the singing of the voluntary church choir, and in this laudable endeavour the society would seem to be making most satisfactory progress. About 200 members, belonging to fourteen choirs, took active part in rendering an impressive service, under the conductorship of Mr. H. Graves, the Organist of St. Michael's, Dumfries, and the originator of the Union. Mr. J. Y. Bushill and Mr. Stevenson were the accompanists. In the evening a secular Concert was given in the Church Hall by members of the Union, when the following vocalists appeared: Miss Tennant, Miss Paton, Miss A. B. Carruthers, Miss McPherson, Mr. Henderson, Mr. A. Gourlay, Mr. F. Lawson, Mr. Foster, and Mr. Smith.

Enniscorthy, County Wexford.—Mr. A. Fitzgerald, on the 14th ult., played in the Cathedral an excellent selection of organ pieces between each of which was sung an excerpt from some well-known Oratorio. The idea is good and should prove attractive.

Georgetown, British Guiana.—A most successful performance of sacred music was given on April 19, in St. Philip's Church, under the conductorship of Mr. W. R. Colbeck. The programme included Gounod's "Messe Solennelle," the solos in which were admirably rendered by Mrs. F. White, Mr. A. Collier, and Mr. Van Eeden, and selections from the works of Handel, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn. The choruses were well sung by about eighty vocalists; and the organ, played by Mr. Nusum, was supplemented by a pianoforte, at which Miss Vyfhuis presided, and a small orchestra. On May 5 Mr. Colbeck gave an Organ Recital in the Town Hall, when the other soloists engaged were Mr. Bye, and Mr. G. C. Vyle, vocalists; Miss McLeod, pianist; and Mr. Anderson, violinist.

Hartfield, Sussex.—Mr. Edwin Barnes gave an attractive Organ Recital on May 28, in St. Mary's Church. He was ably assisted by Mr. W. Greville and Master F. Charlwood, vocalists, and by the Rev. C. N. Sutton, who contributed several violin solos.

Loughton.—An Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church, on the 20th ult., by Mr. Henry Riding. The selection included pieces by Dupont, Eberlin, Riding, Turpin, Lemmens, Moszkowski, and Deshayes. Vocal music was contributed by Master W. Clark, Mr. E. D. Jordan, and the choir, under the direction of Mr. F. Brand.

Lowestoft.—On the 2nd ult. an original operetta, "The Major," by W. G. Wood, was performed at the Pier Pavilion, under the direction of Dr. Bunnett. The work is pleasing and melodious, and was very well received. The vocalists were Miss Emma Fenn, Miss Susetta Fenn, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, and Mr. Frank Swinford, who were recalled at the end of the performance. A short miscellaneous selection, in which Miss Susetta Fenn, Mr. Dunn, and Dr. Bunnett took part, preceded the operetta.

Norwich.—The Orchestral Union, conducted by Mr. E. Harcourt, gave its third Concert on May 23, when Bennett's cantata "The May Queen" was performed, the solos being entrusted to Miss F. Monk, Mrs. W. Johnson, Mr. S. Hemmings, and Mr. F. B. Ranalow. The miscellaneous second part of the programme included Schumann's "Festal Overture," played on this occasion for the first time in Norwich, and the production of an Arabesque for full orchestra, specially written for this Concert by Mr. E. Harcourt.——The Fourteenth Annual Festival of the Epping Forest Church Choir Association was held on the 16th ult., in the Cathedral. The choirs, numbering 300 voices, assembled for the service at three o'clock, and the Festival will long be remembered as one of the brightest and best ever held. The Canticles were sung to a setting by J. H. Stammers. Goss's anthem, "O give thanks," and Smart's Te Deum in F were also rendered in a creditable manner. Brass instruments were used very effectively in the Processional Hymns and other parts of the service. Mr. J. W. Ullyett conducted the choirs, and Mr. H. Riding presided at the organ.

Sheffield.—Mr. Henry Coward's new sacred cantata "The King's Error; or, Micaiah the Prophet," was performed for the first time, on the 12th ult., in the Albert Hall, Sheffield. The work, which is dedicated to Mr. Leonard C. Venables and the members of the Tonic Sol-fa Association, is to be produced at their forthcoming Festival at the Crystal Palace, on the 14th inst. The performance under notice was, therefore, designated a Concert rehearsal, the principals being those engaged for the Crystal Palace performance, and the chorus and orchestra consisting of the large contingent sent up to the Festival from the Sheffield district. The libretto, which is from the pen of Mr. W. W. Chisholm, also of Sheffield, deals with the dramatic story of Ahab, King of Israel, his alliance with Jehosaphat, and the futile efforts of Micaiah to dissuade him from going to war with Benhadad, King of Syria. In his musical treatment of this theme Mr. Coward has been distinctly successful, a marked advance on his previous compositions being manifest. His best writing is to be found in the choral portions, which, while fulfilling the requirement of a degree "exercise," are melodious, varied, and, where necessary, not lacking in vigour. The performance, on the 12th ult., was a pronounced success. The singing of the splendid chorus aroused the audience to enthusiasm, and many numbers were encored. At the close the composer, who conducted, was loudly cheered and recalled many times. The principals were Madame Clara Samuell, Mr. J. Gawthrop, Mr. Robert Grice, and Mr. C. H. Siebert.

ST. ALBANS, HERTS.—The Oratorio Society, conducted by Mr. W. H. Speer, gave, on May 24, an excellent rendering of Dr. Villiers Stanford's ballad "The Revenge" and a number of part-songs. The latter included four composed for the Society by its able Conductor, two of which, severally entitled "Rosalind's Madrigal" and "Go, pretty birds," were especially successful in obtaining the approbation of the audience. The singing of Miss Teresa Blamy and the violin and pianoforte solos contributed by Miss D. Etheridge and Mr. Speer greatly increased the enjoyment of the Concert.

SOUTH BRISBANE.—Mr. Benson's Saturday evening Organ Recitals in Albert Street, during April and May, have attracted large audiences and will doubtless greatly contribute to the increasing popularity of the king of instruments.

STONEBRIDGE.—Mr. Charles H. Moody, a young organist of great promise, gave an effective Organ Recital on the 3rd ult., in the Parish Church, playing in an admirable manner an attractive selection of organ pieces by Bach, Widor, Guilmant, and Salome.

STREATHAM.—Mr. Percy Colson gave a Violin Recital on the 20th ult., in the Town Hall, when he was assisted at the pianoforte by Mr. Francis Bohr. The programme included Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 30, No. 1), and a good selection of pianoforte and violin solos. Mrs. Helen Trust sang several solos with her usual charm.

SYDNEY.—Madame Belle Cole's concert-party, consisting of Miss Emily Spada, Mr. Philip Newbury, Mr. Charles Magrath, and Mdlle. Murkens (violinist), received an enthusiastic welcome at the Town Hall, on May 15, when their brilliant interpretation of a miscellaneous Concert was fully appreciated by a large audience. The company gave a second Concert on the next evening with equal success.

TAUNTON.—The organ in Holy Trinity Church, which has just been re-constructed by Messrs. W. Hill & Son, was formally dedicated on Sunday, May 27, and on the Thursday after Mr. Harold A. Jeboult gave a Recital. The instrument contains three manuals and thirty-four stops.

WARWICK.—Two attractive Organ Recitals were given on the 19th ult., in St. Nicholas Church, by Mr. Alfred Hollins, who played in his usual finished style an admirable selection, which included some effective pieces by Wolstenholme. Vocal excerpts from the Oratorios were contributed by Miss Gill-Smith, Mrs. Rivington, the Rev. W. R. C. Hamilton, and the Rev. Thurston Rivington.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Alfred H. Allen, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Luke's Church, Bedminster, Bristol. —Mr. J. H. Cornish, Organist and Choirmaster to Ewell Parish Church.—Mr. Clement A. Harris, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Columba's Episcopal Church, Crieff, N.B.—Mr. J. Crossland Hirst, Organist and Choirmaster to the Free College Church, Glasgow.—Mr. John Jones, Organist and Choirmaster to St. George's Church, Tredegar, Mon.—Mr. Albert W. Ketelbey, to St. John's, Wimbledon.

RUTH

EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy reapers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventful episode lends itself to a pathetic, picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved and sorrowful trio of women on whom the calamity of poverty and famine has fallen, as if to give intensity to their greater grief, and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal benevolence displayed by the mighty Boaz, who so quickly transforms sorrow into joy, are all introduced and aptly take their allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Citizen.

"The work, like the 'Holy City,' is full of beautiful orchestral passages, while the vocal score abounds with charming numbers."—Bucks Herald.

"'Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. . . . The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject."—Bradford Observer.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"'Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. . . . It contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

BY

C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

The attention which has of late years been given by our Universities to the cultivation of music, and the endeavour to again make the degrees of Doctor and Bachelor in that faculty of substantial value, as marks of real musical erudition and culture on the part of the holder, as was formerly the case, have induced me to try and investigate the early history of these degrees which are peculiar to the English Universities, and are practically unknown abroad.

I have traced the course of the degrees from the earliest time they are mentioned to the present day, when the tendency becomes more and more marked to place music on a level in every respect with the other faculties.

KING ARTHUR
A DRAMATIC CANTATA
FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA
JAMES SMIETON, M.A.
MUSIC BY
JOHN MORE SMIETON.

OLD NOTATION, 2s. 6d.; TONIC SOL-FA, 1s.
Full Score and Band Parts on hire. String Parts for sale at 16s.

The attention of Conductors is specially directed to the above Cantata, as affording an unusually interesting work for Chorus and Soloists. It takes about an hour and forty minutes to perform, and has been given with conspicuous success by the Choral Unions of Dundee, Broughty Ferry, Airdrie, Peebles, Helensburgh, and Hamilton, as well as performances by Miss Holland's Choir (2), Byfield (2), Uckfield, Wakefield, Brondesbury, Glasgow Academy Choir, Glasgow E. Choral Society, Newcastle, Montrose, Stirling, Ayr, Kineton, Arbroath, Selhurst, Chichester, Reading, &c., Choral Societies.

SCOTSMAN.

This beautiful work will enhance the reputation won for its composer by his similar composition, "Ariadne." It shows a charming gift of melody and no small musicianly skill in its merely technical qualities. It may be recommended to Choral Societies as well worthy of study.

MUSICAL TIMES (JUNE 1, 1892).

Mr. John More Smieton's dramatic Cantata "King Arthur" was the pièce de resistance at the annual concert by the Glasgow Academy Choir on April 29. A better choice could hardly have been made, inasmuch as the work has been laid out on lines which cannot fail to prove popular amongst the numerous choral societies ever on the alert for novelty. Mr. James Smieton's admirably written libretto has, indeed, afforded opportunity for effective musical treatment, which is not only graceful and melodious, but eminently graphic in its descriptive power, the work, in short, of a craftsman who is steadily making progress amongst contemporary composers.

DUNDEE EVENING TELEGRAPH (MARCH 30, 1892).

"King Arthur" is called by the composer a cantata, but the name hardly conveys to the mind an idea of the elaborate, lengthy, and powerful character of the work. It is rather a musical epic, and is characterised throughout by a scholarly knowledge of harmony, by a variety and richness of effect, and notably by a melodiousness throughout that are really remarkable. One notable feature which must be mentioned is the effective character of Mr. Smieton's recitatives. The beautiful hymn "There is a land" was a much relished item near the close of the cantata, which ended with a powerful chorus, in which the composer calls up all the resources before him to make a telling and impressive finish to the work.

GLASGOW HERALD (NOVEMBER 30, 1892).

The Eastern Choral Sociey gave a concert last night in the City Hall. The work chosen for performance was Mr. John More Smieton's "King Arthur." Mr. Smieton has set music to his brother's libretto with very happy results, and the work contains many delightful choruses and solos. Miss Annie Lea was the soprano soloist, impersonating Guinevere; Mr. Probert, the tenor (Arthur); Mr. J. W. Render took the music allotted to Merlin and Sir Bedevere. Mr. Cole's orchestra furnished an excellent accompaniment. . . . The choir consisted of about 150 voices, and Mr. George Taggart, the conductor, may be congratulated on having trained them to a high state of efficiency.

BETHLEHEM

FOR SOLI, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

The Words written by JOSEPH BENNETT.

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY A. C. MACKENZIE.

PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS.

In paper boards, 6s.; Cloth, gilt, 7s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

His music is throughout refined, self-restrained, and reverent; if but a few of the "leading motives" (for this device is freely used) startle us by their originality, their treatment is always interesting, and the workmanship masterly.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

For our own part, we think that there are in "Bethlehem" many passages wherein the composer reaches his highest level; some, perhaps, where he soars even higher than he has done in the past. . . A very beautiful scene is reached with the arrival at the manger-side of the adoring throng. Here is assuredly music that goes straight to the heart. . . . "Bethlehem" is brought to a close which leaves neither solidity, power, nor impressiveness to be desired. The ending, indeed, crowns nobly the beauties that have gone before.

STANDARD.

The work is remarkable from first to last for luminous musicianship and purity of style, and portions are equally noteworthy for freshness and charm. . . . On the whole, the second part is more pleasing than the first. After the opening we have a singularly charming song for the Virgin, entitled "In the Stable. The Blessed Mother singeth to her Babe," the first stanza of which is a translation by Coleridge of a Latin verse inscribed on a German picture of the Virgin and Child. Marked to be sung mezzo voce, this may be numbered among Dr. Mackenzie's most delightful inspirations. . . . The Finale is a very dignified ensemble, in which the composer pours forth all his resources, and, consequently, makes a splendid display of musicianship.

DAILY NEWS.

The musical utterances of the Shepherds are sometimes pastoral, sometimes in the style of the old masters, sometimes even grotesque, but always appropriate. Indeed, almost from first to last the Scottish composer seems to have caught the spirit of the text. There is no pedantic display of musicianship, although there is not a number which could have been written by any other than a cultured musician.

SATURDAY REVIEW.

Let us say at once, as a strong opinion, that "Bethlehem" appeals to the layman and the specialist alike as a great work by a great master. When, ten years ago, Dr. Mackenzie gave us his beautiful "Rose of Sharon," it was felt that the modern school of English music had a leader, and that the composer was assuming that position amongst the exponents of his art in this country which posterity had assigned to Berlioz amongst French musicians; "Bethlehem" comes to strengthen that conviction, and, together with the "Rose of Sharon" and Dr. Hubert Parry's "Job," forms a triad of the most commanding works produced in England since "Elijah."

MORNING POST.

In the purely instrumental portions and those where the vocal parts are allotted to a single voice, Dr. Mackenzie is heard at his best. The opening section is one of these. Also the soprano solo, "Be not afraid," which abounds in beautiful phrases. An altogether delightful inspiration is the Cradle Song for soprano, with its delicately refined accompaniment for muted strings.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

The literary excellence of the book is as apparent as is the text of "The Rose of Sharon" or "The Dream of Jubal," in which the author and composer previously joined with such happy results. Dr. Mackenzie has gone to work in the same spirit as his coadjutor. The pastoral style is largely resorted to, but when praise and thanksgiving are in question Dr. Mackenzie gives a free rein to the devotional fervour instinct in so many brilliant and impressive pages in the two works before referred to. Sublimity is not wanting when demanded at particular phases of the story, but the dominating idea has evidently been to appropriately illustrate the simplicity of the manifestation of the birth of the Saviour and the lowly surroundings presented to the gaze of the adoring throng. . . . The instrumentation is as picturesque, descriptive, and glowing as in either of Dr. Mackenzie's preceding works, whilst the choral passages, without offering any great difficulties, are sufficiently attractive to the executants to recompense them for special care in the enunciation of the varying sentiments of wonder, awe, and exultation. Taken as a whole, "Bethlehem" may be pronounced quite worthy its distinguished composer.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

Dr. Mackenzie's music is throughout sincere in aim and ingenious in treatment. . . . he is at his best—as, for example, in the admirably impressive orchestral introduction, so suggestive of night and drowsiness; the extremely clever Oriental march; and the connecting instrumental passages generally. As regards the vocal numbers, special mention must be made of the charming Slumber Song of the Virgin, sung with great taste and effect by Miss Ella Russell; the angelic anthem "Glory to God," a masterly piece of part-writing for female chorus; and the well-wrought Finale for solo quartet and chorus which concludes the work. The orchestration, on which Dr. Mackenzie has evidently lavished especial care, is exceedingly rich, elaborate, and effective.

THE ATHENÆUM.

Dr. Mackenzie's latest utterance in oratorio—and his last, if we may place reliance on words probably uttered in haste—proves that his hand has lost nothing of the virility so splendidly manifested in "Jason," "The Rose of Sharon," and "The Dream of Jubal."

MISS

FANNY DE BOUFFLERS

(SOPRANO)

For Oratorios, Cantatas, Concerts, Operatic Recitals, &c.

"The Scottish Orchestra" (Mr. Georg Henschel, Conductor).—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers contributed much to the enjoyment of the audience. She refused an encore (thrice recalled) for a rendering of the Handelian Air 'Let the bright Seraphim,' but on again being enthusiastically recalled after singing "Should he upbraid," repeated a portion of it."—Glasgow Mail.

"Miss Fanny de Boufflers sang 'Should he upbraid' with a piquancy and brightness which suited the number admirably. The audience was thoroughly pleased, and insisted on a repetition, to which the artist was finally persuaded."—Glasgow Herald.

Cherubini's "O fons amoris."—"A most excellent rendering was given of Cherubini's 'O fons amoris.' The very exacting solo (ranging from C to C in Alt) was splendidly executed by Miss Fanny de Boufflers, whose extensive range and fine method were therein displayed to the greatest advantage. The work is one of the composer's six greater Motets. The intrinsic difficulty of the solo soprano, requiring the extraordinary range of two whole octaves, renders the performance of the work a great rarity."—Liverpool Daily Post.

Rossini's "Stabat Mater."—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers' interpretation of the 'Inflammatus' was at once prayerful and most artistic, and well worthy of her high reputation as an exponent of sacred music."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Elijah" (Lambrian Choral Society).—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers sang the heavy work which is allotted to the soprano with sympathy, fervour, and dramatic fire throughout."—Birkenhead Advertiser.

City Hall Concert, Glasgow.—"Signor Foli and party attracted an immense audience. . . . Signor Foli sang the duet with Miss Fanny de Boufflers, 'La Dove Prende' (Mozart). Miss de Boufflers appeared once before this season at these concerts, and her performances on Saturday night more than confirmed, they greatly increased the highly favourable impression she made on the former occasion. The selections she gave were admirably fitted to show the rich, full and flexible quality of her voice."—North British Daily Mail.

"A soprano of very considerable worth, receiving a most emphatic demonstration of appreciation from her hearers."—Glasgow Herald.

"Powerful and clear soprano voice."—Northern Daily Telegraph.

"Whose vocalisation was artistic and refined."—Western Daily Press, Bristol.

"Powerful soprano, . . . considerable natural talent."—Manchester Guardian.

"Possesses a bright, pure soprano voice."—Walsall Observer.

"An artist of decided abilities."—Waterford Star.

"Remarkably sweet and powerful soprano."—Cork Herald.

"Has a well-trained, pure and beautiful voice."—Harrogate Advertiser.

"Was a great success, . . . received with unbounded applause."—Dublin Evening Telegraph.

Extract from the Liverpool Daily Post, June 4, 1894.—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers is in growing demand as leading vocalist at our popular watering-places and health resorts. Having just fulfilled an engagement at Llandudno, our Liverpool prima donna is now at Rhyl, where she remains for a week, next visiting in turn Blackpool, Buxton, Douglas, Lytham, Harrogate, Scarborough, &c., and some return visits, including a special engagement during the week of the royal visit to Rhyl; in all over eleven weeks' engagement."

THE MUSICAL TIMES

STRAY NOTES ON THE SEASON.

Whatever strictures may be passed on the summer season of 1894, it must at least be conceded that, on the score of activity, variety, and interest, no legitimate ground for complaint can be discovered even by the most exacting critic. It is not our intention, however, at the present moment to attempt any exhaustive summary of the events of the past few months. We would rather endeavour to call attention to some of those features which have differentiated the past season from its predecessors, or at any rate have been specially prominent throughout its course.

The opera affords a convenient starting-point for our random reflections, and here there are certainly no lack of salient, possibly epoch-making characteristics in the recent annals of Sir Augustus Harris's management at Covent Garden. Not only have the French or French-trained singers once more proved their incontestable superiority over all-comers as executants, but the French composers have asserted their predominance in the repertory to an extent that has been quite unprecedented. The season of 1894 has been pre-eminently a French season, no less than three important novelties—"Werther," "La Navarraise," and, above all, "L'Attaque du Moulin"—having been of French origin as against two Italian operas, "Falstaff" and "Manon Lescaut"; while amongst the stock pieces of the repertory, "Faust," "Roméo et Juliette," and "Carmen" have fully maintained their popularity. As a producer of new operas, Germany has fallen hopelessly into the rear, having been represented at Covent Garden by only a single act opera from the pen of Mr. Emil Bach, while in Germany itself the operatic stage, if we exclude Wagner, seems to be almost entirely given up to young Italians or Scandinavians.

The musical merits of the new works produced within the last couple of months at Covent Garden are discussed elsewhere, but we may be allowed to seize the occasion for a few words of regretful if old-fashioned protest against the ruling passion by which all composers of the day—except Verdi in his last work—are consumed for strong, brutal, or gruesome subjects. It began with that squalid little tragedy of Verga's, "Cavalleria Rusticana"—since when every one has been trying to "go one better" than Mascagni in regard to violent or repulsive situations. Infidelity, murder, and sudden death are become the sole stock in trade of the librettist. Lest we should be accused of exaggeration, we would ask our readers to study the plots of "Pagliacci," with its double murder at the fall of the curtain; of "Manon Lescaut," with its partially indescribable plot; of "La Navarraise," all blood and thunder, in which a general is assassinated, the hero wounded to death, and the heroine goes mad; of "Werther," which ends in suicide; of "L'Attaque du Moulin," which reeks of the horrors of war; of "Signa" and of "The Lady of Longford," in both of which the curtain falls upon two corpses. We do not deny that some of these plots are singularly impressive, and, in the case of M. Bruneau's work, fraught with a powerful moral. But this quest of horrors is being really rather overdone. The everlasting murder in the last scene is getting terribly monotonous. The mortality amongst the dramatis personæ of a modern opera is so alarmingly high—something about

50 per cent. per annum — that an insurance agent, on visiting Covent Garden a few weeks ago, is reported to have observed: "If people always behaved like that in real life, I certainly should not be able to afford a stall at the Opera."

Why should we be condemned always to sup full of horrors when we go now-a days to the opera? Are we never to witness a piece with a happy ending again? To judge from appearances there are no symptoms of a reaction at present. On the contrary, when "Rigoletto" was given this season, the more gruesome version of the last scene of all was revived, no doubt as being more in tune with the cadaverous tastes of our age. Recently published Blue Books have given rise to alarmist views as to the increase of insanity. Various causes are assigned—heredity, inebriety, and so forth. Perhaps the depressing influence of modern opera should also be taken into account. However, we are not entirely without hope of improvement in this respect. Verdi has set an example in his "Falstaff" which can hardly fail to exert a wholesome influence on his juniors. And if the composers are unwilling to essay more cheerful themes on their own initiative, their audiences will in time revolt against the tyranny of tears and insist on occasionally hearing wedding bells instead of funeral knells at the close of their operatic entertainment.

With a brief allusion to three other special features of the past season at Covent Garden, we may conclude this rambling review of matters operatic. One was the introduction of Maxim guns in "La Navarraise" and another the introduction of the child actress in "The Lady of Longford." We will not go so far as to endorse the unfeeling remark of an amateur, that he wished the one could have been brought to bear on the other; but we trust that neither innovation will be erected into a precedent. As regards operatic cannonades, we may conveniently quote the remarks recently made by Mr. Justice Chitty in granting an interim injunction against some street organs: "If a person knowingly contributed to noise, so as to magnify the noise to a degree which in the result constituted a nuisance, he was responsible for the result as a whole, although his contribution, if it had stood alone, would not have amounted to a nuisance." Finally, a few words are due in this connection to the exceptional care which has been devoted to the scenic and other accessories of the new operas produced at Covent Garden this season. For picturesque realism in regard of costumes and "sets," the mounting of "La Navarraise" and of "L'Attaque du Moulin" has never been surpassed on the operatic boards in this country. If, in the foregoing remarks, we have abstained from any reference to the representations of German opera at Drury Lane, it has been because they have not called for any special remark. At best they have fallen under the category of meritorious "scratch" performances. Still we owe Sir Augustus Harris a debt of gratitude for the revival of "Der Freischütz," the success of which may encourage him to repeat the experiment with a Covent Garden cast.

On turning to the concert-room, we are confronted once more with the ridiculous congestion of entertainments in the months of May and June. Matters, from the point of view of the critic, at any rate, have not been mended by the increase in the number of halls available for the aspiring concert-giver. The Queen's Hall adds two to the existing list, and a third has within the last few weeks been opened at Messrs. Erard's. The result is that there can be and occasionally are half-a-dozen concerts going on simultaneously at the principal halls, to say nothing of minor or outlying places, such as St. Martin's Hall and Westminster or Kensington Town Halls. The situation is trying enough from the point of view of the conscientious critic, but it is deplorable from that of the concert-giver, owing to the constant clashing of really important events and the consequent sub-division of audiences. Mr. Vert, in an interesting interview with the Westminster Gazette, has recently been giving his advice to those about to hold concerts, and it closely corresponds with the historic counsel offered by Mr. Punch to those about to marry. But there seems to be as little chance of the advice being accepted in the former as in the latter case. Musicians are born to give concerts as the sparks fly upward.

The deluge of concerts cannot be regarded as a special mark of the present season, though we believe the "record" number held in a week was reached in June. What has really been a distinguishing feature of the musical year of grace, 1894, has been the development of the one-man (or one-woman) programme, in which the composer has himself (or herself) been associated with the performance. To this head are to be referred the Saint-Saëns Concert at the Wolff Musical Union, and the Concerts given by Mdlle. Chaminade, Miss M. V. White, M. Bemberg, Mr. Arthur Somervell, and Mrs. Henschel. Then we have also had the Schumann Concert, given by Mr. David Bispham, and the three musical evenings devoted to Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms by Miss Shinner, Miss Fillunger, and Mr. Borwick. The list might be still further extended, but a sufficient number of instances have been adduced to show that the practice is on the increase.

Another really noteworthy sign of the times is the remarkable growth in the numbers of female executants. Rubinstein, in his brochure on "Music and its Representatives," published a couple of years back, dwelt on this fact as a symptom of artistic decadence. We cannot help thinking that if the great pianist were to attend one of the orchestral performances of the Royal College of Music he might be moved to reconsider his verdict. But perhaps the most striking instance of this tendency is to be found in the constitution of the Handel Festival orchestra. In 1891 half-a-dozen ladies were, for the first time, admitted to the ranks of the band. In 1894 their numbers attained the imposing figure of forty-nine, or nearly a tenth of the entire body.

In regard of choral music, the summer season of 1894 has been noticeable for the visits of three Continental choirs, the Amsterdam à cappella Choir, and the male-voice choirs from Berne and Upsala. It is much to be regretted that, owing to defective management and the ill-chosen time of their advent, the Dutch singers met with so inadequate a recognition of their talents. Finally, in the domain of instrumental music, we may single out for especial notice the exceptionally successful season of the Philharmonic Society and the first visit to these shores of Herr Mottl.

FROM MY STUDY.

There is timeliness in a portrait of Marietta Alboni, seeing how recently she departed from the scene of many triumphs, and from the world in which, after closing her public career, she long figured, not only as a laurelled artist in retirement, but as a grande dame in society. Alboni, alive the other day, formed a connecting link between the great era of Italian Opera and the present generation. Only twenty-three years have passed since, out of devotion to the illustrious friend of her youth, she came to England with Rossini's "Messe Solennelle," and took part in the performance of that work. Many who read these words can recall the appearance of the famous contralto in St. James's Hall. She was then forty-seven years old. Youth had fled, and middle-age, with the redundant physique it so often bestows, had set in. Looking at Alboni then, it was not quite easy to conceive that she had once worn the dress of Maffio Orsini. The girl had developed into the large and comfortable-looking woman of mature years, and the voice, it is scarcely necessary to add, had lost its youthful freshness. But, as all who heard her sing must remember, the rich timbre, the rare equality throughout the registers, and the perfect method, were evident in a striking degree. The tones of her voice can still be called up from the depths of memory, and the charm of her phrasing and expression is yet a recollection. So, too, is the characteristic measure of languor—the evidence of a nature not intensely susceptible to emotion—which, even in the artist's young days, detracted in a certain degree from the merit of her work.

This is not a biography, and beyond saying that Alboni was born at Cesena in 1824, and obtained lessons from Rossini, I shall not trouble myself with the story of her early years. For the present, interest begins with her sensational first appearance at Covent Garden Theatre. In 1847 there was war to the knife between Benjamin Lumley and the seceders who had started an opposition. Costa, Grisi, Mario, and others had left the Haymarket house and taken no little prestige from it to a rival establishment. Lumley's counter-stroke was the engagement of Jenny Lind, and the setting in of a tide of fortune which threatened to leave the Covent Garden venture high and dry. The whole story of this warfare could be told here, did space permit and necessity demand. It was Lumley's practice to collect from the journals of the day all references, of any importance, to operatic affairs. These, pasted into huge volumes, came into my possession not long since, and may serve some future owner for a History of Opera in England, which I shall never have time to write. For present purposes there is no need to consult them. Enough that Covent Garden replied to the triumph of the Haymarket by putting forward Marietta Alboni. Of the nature of the retort the management could hardly have been conscious. Alboni had just been singing at Rome with success, but when Covent Garden offered, and she accepted, the sum of £500 for the season, it did not appear that sensational results were expected on either side. But the artist's début in "Semiramide" wrought a wonderful change. A single performance sufficed to show of what a treasure the theatre had become possessed, and so affected was the manager that he deemed it prudent to show most unmanagerial liberality by raising the new contralto's salary from £500 to £2,000. It is true that the "exhibition" of a counter-stimulant did not abate the Jenny Lind fever. Nothing could do that; but Alboni was a powerful support to the fortunes of a young enterprise just threatened with adversity against which, at one time, it seemed almost hopeless to contend. The public delighted in their new favourite. They found her person and stage manner attractive, while her voice, so rich and rare in quality, and her perfect vocalisation, were charms in which to revel. Thus did the young Italian leap at a single bound to the highest point of English favour, remaining there till the close of her operatic career.

Alboni came to Covent Garden in 1848, but, in the year following, transferred her services to Her Majesty's Theatre, where she appeared in '49, '51, '56, '57, and '58. Of her doings in other countries it is needless to speak. She worked hard and travelled much, but her voice, used according to the best method, withstood the effects of wear and tear as well as of climatic changes, and remained surprisingly good till her latest year. As the widowed Countess Pepoli, and in retirement, Alboni was the centre of an admiring circle. She sang almost to the last, not only for the delectation of friends, but in the cause of charity, to the cry of which she was never deaf.

The portrait of Giulia Grisi on the opposite page will hardly be recognised by those who have seen representations of the great soprano as she appeared in later life, or whose personal remembrance of her is connected only with a last unhappy appearance, in 1866, on the stage of Her Majesty's Theatre. Yet the picture is true, for all that. A writer who saw her in the flush of early youth compared her to Pasta in face and figure, "only much handsomer." According to all accounts, she must have had a dazzling and bewitching personality, at once beautiful and stately. Pity that this rarely-gifted creature, rose and nightingale in one, so lingered on the stage that mingled with the glorious traditions of her prime are saddening memories of her decadence.

Zola's Dr. Pascal would have claimed Grisi as an example of heredity. Music came to her as an inheritance. Grassini was her aunt, and there is reason to believe that her mother, before marrying one of Napoleon's engineer officers, belonged to the same profession. The idea of heredity is further supported by the fact that Giulia's elder sister, Giuditta, was a singer of repute, as her cousin, Carlotta, would have been had she not turned her attention from music to dancing. Grisi's soldier-father may have given to her character the qualities which made her a very old campaigner indeed. Through him, perhaps, came the resolute spirit, the indomitable energy, which would never recognise defeat, and led her to fight a hopeless battle to the bitter end, even against Father Time himself. A while ago I published in this journal, from an autograph letter in my possession, a characteristic utterance of the great artist when in her declining years. She had been virtually superseded in London by younger aspirants, and her manager, obviously designing an end to the connection, had spoken of a testimonial. Grisi was too shrewd not to understand the project, and in her letter to the manager, as some readers may remember, she pleaded with pathetic earnestness that a testimonial would be interpreted as a leave-taking, and that she could not bear to part from the dear country which had always treated her so well. She even ventured to anticipate fresh triumphs, and pointed out Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera," then unknown here, as a work in which she would like to appear. In 1861 the late Mr. Gye acted more diplomatically than the impresario just referred to, and, by making it worth Grisi's while not to perform in England for five years, brought her to recognise defeat at last. Like Napoleon, she signed her abdication and retired to Elba. But no sooner had the five years run out than, like Napoleon when weary of Elba, her soul was in arms and eager for the fray. Never was musical London more astonished than on hearing, through Mr. Mapleson, that the old campaigner meant again to tread the war-path. The result we all know. The veteran met her Waterloo on that painful night in 1866, and went down never to rise again. She was hissed—she, Grisi, who had held a position in London for twenty-seven years, and during much of that time reigned as queen of lyric drama! A more conspicuous and terrible warning against lagging superfluous on the stage I do not know.

Blotting out the years of decadence and the final catastrophe, the student of Grisi's career is conscious only of surpassing brilliancy—of triumphs which, regarded in their measure and prolongation, are almost, if not quite, unexampled. She was victrix not in England only. Her conquests extended to every musical country which she deemed worth invading. Everywhere her superb presence, splendid vocal powers, and convincing dramatic gifts brought men and cities to her feet. She is one of the few in her profession whose names are a permanent record in the annals of music. Other names may be, as poor Keats untruly said of his own, "writ in water"; hers is engraved upon imperishable brass.

With Grisi must needs go Mario, Conte di Candia. Those who remember the famous tenor as he was before his powers began to fail already see him invested with a halo of romance. He is precisely the musical character around whom, if this were not a materialistic age, myths would gather, showing him to far removed posterity as, perhaps, a combination of all that is beautiful and wonder-working in the fabled heroes of ancient Greece. As a singer, there was romance in his origin. We often find our tenors in the vineyard or the artizan's workshop. Mario in his youth represented the fine flower of an aristocratic family, whose grace and beauty for many generations past were, one might suppose, reproduced and centred in his person. How, as an officer in the Piedmontese Guard, the young Count must have turned the heads and flattered the gentle bosoms of the fair! His own head was certainly turned by the worship he received. In him physical beauty and courteous manners triumphed all along the line, but the victory was not won without sacrifice. Like another dandy, Count d'Orsay, Mario was flattered into expensive tastes, and amid the whirl of Parisian life, towards which the young Italian nobleman naturally gravitated, slender resources soon melted away. This was a critical time. In the case of many a man similarly situated it has led to the career of an adventurer, to living upon the means of infatuated women, to gambling, and worse. Happily for the Conte di Candia, he had the divine gift of song. He carried a fortune about with him which he could not squander. In his impecunious condition, friends reminded him of this, and at last necessity triumphed over family pride—or, rather, compromised with it on the basis of an understanding that the family name should never be used by the professional singer. Exit Mario, Conte di Candia, enter plain Mario, operatic tenor.

According to the critics of the day, Mario had many of the specialties of an amateur when he made his début in London, June 6, 1839. He charmed by the distinction of his person and the beauty of his voice, but much was left for him to learn. I have known professional singers who never got beyond this stage. They remained through life looking over the fence dividing them from true artistic qualification. Mario got over it—not at a bound. He clambered over with some pains, and then went on to the highest renown. "For the stage he was born," well says Mr. Julian

Giulia Grisi.

Marshall, "and to the stage he remained faithful during his artistic life. To the brilliance of his success in opera he brought one great helping quality—the eye for colour and all the important details of costume. His figure on the stage looked as if it had stepped out of the canvas of Titian, Veronese, or Tintoretto. Never was an actor more harmoniously and beautifully dressed for the characters he impersonated—no mean advantage, and no slight indication of the artistic temperament." Apropos to this matter, I can vividly recall Mario's last appearances as Roméo in Gounod's now familiar opera. He was then over fifty years old, but he wore his beautiful Italian costumes with the elegance of his youthful days, and well do I remember being fascinated with the apparently unstudied grace of his poses in the Balcony scene. With such a Roméo of fifty any Juliette of sixteen might have been pardoned for falling in love. Mario left the stage in 1867, and who that was fortunate enough to be present can forget the impressive scene as the great artist, wearing the monkish robe of Fernando in "La Favorite," appeared before the curtain. The house was moved to its very heart, and from Royalty, represented by the Cambridge family, down to the humblest denizen of the gallery, bade their favourite an enthusiastic and, in not a few cases, a tearful farewell. As for Mario himself, the depth of his feeling was clear beyond mistake. It is sad to think that one who, for many years, had commanded a princely income, suffered in his old age from straitened means. But Mario could never learn even the rudiments of prudence in money matters. He squandered his earnings as freely as he had run through his patrimony; not, however, in vicious ways, unless it be a vice to smoke the most expensive cigars all day long. Meeting a beggar in the street he would give him the first coin that came between his finger and thumb, silver or gold mattered not. His house was the rendezvous of every needy Italian in London who had wit enough to trump up a good story, and there the fraternity passed a very excellent time. Their good-natured host had to pay later on, when he himself became the recipient of that which it is hard to call charity, but was charity nevertheless. The last time I saw Mario was at the Lyceum Theatre. He had come from Rome to visit his daughters, and men pointed out to one another the white-haired Conte di Candia (he had resumed his title), remarking that, despite change, the beauty and distinction of his person remained as great as ever.

I am indebted to a valued correspondent for information concerning the artist by whom the group of pianists reproduced in last month's Musical Times was drawn:

"Joseph Kriehuber (not Friehuber) was born December 14, 1801, at Vienna; and died there May 30, 1876. His extraordinary gift in drawing at once on the lithographing stone the portraits of the celebrities of the Austrian capital, and those who visited Vienna, was the theme of general admiration. Far from being melancholy or sentimental,* he was one of the most humorous and witty of artists, and whilst he took the likeness he continually talked, and thus tried to bring life and animation into the face of the sitter. His charges for a portrait, including 100 proofs, were £7 (70 gulden). The publishers, Mechetti, Diabelli, and Haslinger were his best customers, for they published the portraits of all famous composers and artists, and a collection of them would be of the highest interest."

The same correspondent sends me also some very interesting particulars with regard to another figure in the group:—

"Carl Czerny was one of the most modest and unassuming men. Although I was myself a pupil of Mozart's son, I enjoyed Czerny's advice, and had often to play for him. He was never married, and lived, after the death of his parents, with their old and trusted servant in large apartments, two rooms of which contained his very extensive library—German, French, Italian, and English—besides all the (at that time) obtainable works of the musical classics. His taste was very liberal and thoroughly catholic.

* He plainly appears to be both in the drawing.—X.

Although devoted to Mozart, Sebastian Bach, and Beethoven more than to anyone else, he knew how to appreciate everything good. His appearance was like that of a Roman Catholic priest; a velvet cap on his head, black suit, and gold-rimmed spectacles. He spoke in a most sympathetic manner, using the most polite expressions, and took a lively interest in the career of young artists. He was exceedingly systematic in the disposition of his day. An early riser, he worked till about 10 a.m., when he made his daily round in the shops of Diabelli, Haslinger, and Mechetti. At Diabelli's he met old Gyrowetz, Assmayer (Organist to the Court), Preyer, Halm, old Diabelli, C. Lickl, Leschetitzky, sen., and others; and their friendly conversation was exceedingly pleasant to hear. Czerny seldom missed a Concert—indeed, he had a fixed place in the Saal der 'Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde,' the Concerts beginning at 12.30 and lasting till 1.45 p.m. After his dinner he received the daily visit of Mr. A. Pfahler, Director of the Mint, an excellent amateur pianist, with whom he played a game of chess. After this he occupied himself with writing. He actually wrote on three different tables, and when I paid him my last visit (1854) he worked on one table at sonatinas, on another he was active with arrangements of operatic airs, and on the third table were the sheets of a full score, containing a cantata for solo, chorus, and orchestra, on Schiller's 'Kraniche des Ibycus.' He told me that the first two tables contained 'leichte Waare,' and that at the last he wrote for his own pleasure. He would never miss the performance of 'Fidelio,' or one of Mozart's operas. Among his most renowned pupils were Liszt, Döhler, Kullak, Lacombe, Madame Belleville-Oury, and Alfred Jaell.

"He left the whole of his fortune and his library to the Vienna Conservatoire, and also a sum sufficient to pay, with the interest thereof, for a performance of Mozart's 'Requiem' on the anniversary of his death. It is said (I cannot vouch for accuracy) that he never touched the fees paid to him for lessons—a ducat in gold (10s.) for each lesson—but collected them in a bag, which on his death was found to contain no less than 30,000 coins. He was in every way a remarkable, worthy, and estimable man." X.

MUSIC IN COMBINATION WITH POETRY AND IDEAS:

PROGRAMME-MUSIC, &c.

By Eustace J. Breakspeare.

Seeking to draw an antithetic distinction between music and poetry, Ambros (in "Die Grenzen der Musik und Poesie") remarks that, while in poetry the sentiments are raised through the medium of ideas, in music, reversely, it is the ideas which are reached through the sentiments. Other questions then become involved, such as whether the sentiments aroused in music are, in themselves, of that definiteness which we take to be implied by the word "idea"; whether, again, the process or rapport between these sentiments and ideas is a clearly distinguishable one, and—assuming the particular sentiment awakened—whether the supposed equivalent, causal, or companion idea would always follow. What there is generally faulty in ordinary appreciations upon these well-debated, but far from settled questions, results, we take it, from the initial mistaken attempt to get from music the same sort of effects which are produced more peculiarly by other arts. But Ambros (and, by the way, we refer particularly to this writer, since the above-mentioned brochure is perhaps the most able of all contributions to æsthetical controversy upon what we may term the anti-Hanslickian side) is indisputably correct when he remarks that "music shall carry with it the conditions of its own existence." We shall inquire—and this is our only present object—how far this dictum respects the claim of song-music, and, in its close connection therewith, "programme-music," as it is called. Ambros, while asserting the widest expositional power of music, has yet little to say in favour of the latter class of compositions. He complains of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" on the ground that the "gravital centre" of the composition lies really outside the musical work itself—in Shakespeare, namely. He asks: "When a programme is added, does not music here admit that her own means are insufficient to display what she intends?" And he illustrates his argument by a whimsical reference to those old-fashioned pictures wherein people are shown conversing together, while the words of their speech are seen contained in certain scrolls issuing from their mouths. The mistake here lies in the assumption that the laws of the pure musical art preclude the employment of music in combination with other arts, and under other conditions. A programme is not added because we otherwise should not understand the subject of the music, but for the reason that musical forms—whatever their capabilities in their strictly musical respects—are found to aptly illustrate, by the help of certain analogies of characteristic expression, an idea, or series of ideas, so long as the latter are either given along therewith or are understood. Now, if it be granted, as we think it will, that music does possess such a power of illustration under such conditions, it seems to us very mistaken to still argue as though apart from this association of words or ideas it yet claimed to possess the same power, or that it should be expected so to do; or that the music resorted to the programme in order to cover or supply its own deficiencies.

To what extent the retention of pure instrumental forms becomes impracticable or impossible under these altered æsthetic conditions is another question. But that programme-music (in the same category as music to words) has its raison d'être, independent of absolute musical laws; and that, reversely, no modification of musical forms in these combinations can at all affect the pure conditions of the art, has not been recognised by Ambros and other writers who have denounced this new development in art. Because we admit such a thing as programme-music, the art need not be supposed crying out for word exposition. We ought to discern, by this time, how much depends upon the rightful recognition, in criticism, of what are the pure as distinguished from the "mixed" conditions, so to call them, of an art. Ambros asks: "How are we to know that the theme allotted to the trombone and ophicleide in Berlioz's 'Romeo and Juliet' is meant to announce Prince Escalus"? Such a question as this we regard as distinctly unfair and uncritical. It is overlooked therein that programme-music—strictly within the literal sense of the term—makes us acquainted beforehand with all such concreta; music pretends but to illustrate the latter, not to interpret or propound them, in its absolute capacity. Neither are we supposed herein to be listening to a kind of ingenious charade or musical enigma, the secret of which we must needs guess at, if the music does not plainly enough convey it. Ambros sums up to this effect: That music preserves its own proper limits so long as it does not attempt to transcend its own capabilities of expression, nor require any foreign element to be brought in having no necessary connection with the music itself. We repeat that the "foreign element" is not at all "brought in" to assist the imagination, but is a conditional presentation along with the music. In all art combinations, each art must necessarily sacrifice certain of its formal characteristics. On the part of music, the demand for formal symmetry and balance is considerably lessened or modified. On the other hand, many of the elements which constitute the formal beauties of poetry could be, even if retained, no longer perfectly appreciated with a musical accompaniment—thus, to a great extent, rhyme and metrical delicacies. How can we maintain as essential any element, the absence of which would hardly be felt or perceived? Poetical idea, in fact, must be distinguished from poetical art. The motif of a verse may be highly poetical, but in its exposition the technical craft may be of a very mean sort. Many instances, too, might be quoted of poems which have all their specific beauties lost in a musical setting. Musical rhythm—unless, indeed, the recitative or arioso style be adopted—is, in some respects, less variable than that of poetry; it is bound to have its regular measured lengths, and even in free instrumental developments this orderly construction is more or less observed, all deviations being regarded as exceptional. So that, whenever words and music enter into union, we generally find that the rhythmical nuances of the former subordinate and fit themselves to the superior and more uniform movement of the latter.

It is, however, difficult to say where exactly should be set the limits to the release of each art from its own specific laws. It may, nevertheless, be seen quite possible for the several arts, in their combinational working, to preserve all their essential attributes, without, however, being forced to comply with all the conditions to which the pure, "absolute" art work may be submitted. You cannot have music successful in combination with words that shall also be successful—or should be expected to prove equally successful—as a simple instrumental piece. How far the adjunct of poetic ideas or words interferes with the development of the music per se; what parts are properly allotted to each in the different forms wherein they may present themselves together—these are questions still open at the present day. All the same, a widely spreading taste is unmistakable for that class of art in which, over and beyond the strictly musical element, there is some superaddition of a poetical sort. The whole tendency of modern musical art is in this direction, and no magisterial decisions upon the question can possibly influence the same.

From the very earliest periods in the history of the musical art the effects of musical sound seem to have prompted the most extravagant conceptions. In early Christian times there became elaborated a mystic symbolism of sounds. Correspondences, too, were sought between the phenomena of Nature and those of music. Of course, when instrumental music became developed as a distinct province of art, immense scope was offered to the fancy and the imitative faculty. Thus we find Frohberger attempting to musically depict certain incidents of his own life experience. Couperin's "Pièces de Clavecin," formal and unsuggestive as they are to a modern ear, have their fanciful titles. Johann Kuhnau's "Biblical Histories, in six Sonatas, to be played upon the Clavier, for the delectation of music-lovers," is a truly characteristic specimen of these old-fashioned attempts at "programme" writing. No. 1 of this series represents the combat of David and Goliath; in No. 2 we have "Saul being cured by David"; No. 3, "the Marriage of Jacob," &c. In his preface the composer explains how the parallel fifths are intended to represent Saul's "violent passion"! This work is dated 1700. Three Organ Concertos of the Abbé Vogler are entitled respectively, "The Death of Duke Leopold," "The Last Judgment," and "A Naval Battle." The latter piece introduces wind and waves, cries of the wounded, &c. Our early classic masters, however, seem—with a few pardonable exceptions—to have rather avoided this too realistic form of imitation. This, at a time when the absurdity of such things could not have been so apparent, speaks much for their taste, judgment, and intuitive appreciation of the fitting and true in art. All along, however, the growing custom of composers in general to associate certain sentiments or realistic events with their musical work must, as a natural consequence, tend to firmly establish the opinion that this imitational business must needs pertain legitimately to the functions of the art. Certainly we should expect in vain to have a distinction made between such works wherein fancies of this sort only serve as incentives to the composer's play of imagination, and those wherein these form the prime raison d'être of the work, and which the music, for its concern, must do its best to further illustrate and embellish.

"That music which, separated from its text, does not present the pure musical Beautiful in melody, harmony, and rhythm, is, for that reason, no beautiful music at all." So runs the dictum of Zimmermann. The question here involved seems, to our thinking, one of degree. We have already remarked how musical form may be affected, more or less, in the union of music with words or programme. The formal design of a work is not, however, an "element" in the same way with melody, harmony, and rhythm. It is largely conditioned by the subject of the work, and when this enters under new conditions the form may need to be modified accordingly. The elements above referred to are not so much liable to this exceptional influence. Whatever the requirements of logical development, a work might never become utterly forgetful of its melodic, harmonic, and rhythmical interest. On the other hand, it may be allowed that even these elementary constituents of a musical work, as employed in following out some prescribed plan, or in illustrating some given text, shall be so far modified that when the music is (experimentally) divested of its logical accompaniment, the said musical elements shall no longer please or satisfy of themselves. It would, indeed, be wrong to say that only such was "schöne Musik" that admitted equally well of being presented under the conditions of absolute music.

Did a piece really express what its title indicates it would need no title at all. Even Wagner remarks: "When the musician—i.e., the absolute, the pure instrumental musician—attempts to paint, he produces a thing which is neither music nor painting." Schumann says: "They who would judge of the effect and value of the conceptions (Gebilde) so formed, need only to strike away the titles. If a composer presents me with a programme along with his composition, I say, 'Let me hear, first of all, whether you have made fine music, and then I will please to consider your programme.' Woe to the piece whose construction is not already so musically logical and obvious as to need the apology of a programme." In weighing these sentences we must remember that many of Schumann's compositions, though bearing titles, in reality belonged to the "absolute" order of music, his titles, as a rule, being attached only after the work of composition. Therefore, to any work of the same kind his injunction would unquestionably apply. Some distinction needs to be made. No faulty music, certainly, could be suffered to pass on the simple claim that it had to conform to certain suggestions of a title, the music all along being of this particular kind.

Despite the dicta of certain art writers, fidelity or truthfulness, in the portraiture of a given subject, does not alone bespeak or provide for beauty in the work. This mere truthfulness, unless the ordinary demands for euphony, agreeable melody, &c., are therewith satisfied, does not much avail. How many passages could we not quote, in modern works, which aim at minute and realistic characterisation—and so far succeed—but which, nevertheless, leave little if any pleasurable impression in actual performance! On the other hand, how many charming arias of the Italian school, e.g., fail wholly to accord with—still less to illustrate or intensify—the dramatic situation into which they are introduced! Were not such distinctions ungenerous, we could point to one or two very clever operas by certain of our leading writers which we, for our own part, have found extremely enjoyable, studied at the desk; but which have proved confessedly failures heard under their proper conditions. Complete appreciation of the works in their fine, subtle (possibly too subtle) touches of musical delineation has, for one thing, pre-supposed a full knowledge of every detail, every word of the libretto. A composer at least must not lose sight of ordinary musical requirements in the attempt to realise peculiar ideals presented in art-combinations, or to satisfy certain theoretical exigencies therein. Till audiences as well as composers have learned that there are certain varying conditions upon which the proper enjoyment of such art works depend, and submit to these, we may often be treated to the experience of a work, written in perfect accordance with the rules of the specific art, yet failing to make the calculated and possibly deserved impression. How far such modifications, made imperative by the altered conditions set up in the combination of different arts, may extend, must be determined by artistic taste and intuition, in view of individual circumstances. For example: no true artist would so far renounce the conditions of abstract music as to make his music little else than a mere running commentary, so to speak, upon the logical theme, destitute of all ordinary musical cohesion and interest, simply because a strict architectural plan might be seen incompatible with the logical process of the text. Küster, in speaking of symbolical representation in general, remarks: "The tonal idea should not merely elucidate the subject; it must be so selected that the limits are observed which cultivated taste prescribes to the artistic representation of the same, as to music generally. And this leads to the question of purity of style."

To sum up. In these combinations, music, on the one hand, must not be so subordinated to its libretto, or to the logical course of ideas in a "programme," as to lose all musical cohesion; nor, on the other hand, should the poetic thoughts serve but as the mere peg upon which to string a succession of formally cut phrases and periods. How far a perfect chemical amalgamation, so to speak, of the two elements is possible; or whether they can only be shaken together, like oil and water, without any real coalescence, is a question which will be largely decided by the success or otherwise of practical experiments. Only let us beware of hasty a priori judgments. Let us remember that while poetry has its ideas to convey, music forms its own subject-matter: the one art has a double aspect, the other but a single one. Köstlin is wrong in saying that "Poetry employs tone only as a sign for a mental thing." This art has its musical, formal, æsthetic sides as well as its idealogical one. This writer adds: "Words do not, as with musical sounds, attract by their musical beauty (!), but by what they conventionally signify. It is not the musical element of the words which forms the matter of poetry—(another thing altogether!)—but only that which these words convey, thoughts and ideas." Certainly it is not, as in music, the essential matter of the art, but it is all the same an important and indispensable element thereof. When music is employed but as a mere "colouring" embellishment to the sister art, all its architectural conditions—based upon melodic, rhythmic, thematic, and formal contrivances—are made largely impossible, and it is reduced to mere melismatic tone-and-chord successions—to the elementary impressions of musical Klang, in short. Writers of such music are at the very antipodes to those old setters of words, who simply used the words of a song for their rhythmical assistance, or at the most aimed at a musical expression of the broadest ranges of sentiment.

Of course all depends upon what we regard as essential to musical form, &c., under these conditions. If, e.g., it be held absolutely necessary that such compositions should always have their "first" and "second subjects," their "passages of development," of "repetition," and so on—then it will confessedly be hopeless to expect any perfect amalgamation of music and poetry. On the other hand, though no one may demand that the music of a song shall fulfil all the conditions of an instrumental piece, yet it must, inter alia, have a well defined melody, and there must be a certain formal plan throughout, satisfying sufficiently the universal æsthetic demands for variety, contrast, balance, and unity. Beyond this, the concessions upon the one side or the other, as before said, must be determined by the particular exigencies of the individual work.

Let the motional principle of the music be congruent with that of the words, and an illusion is largely effected that the music has but interpreted the quality and significance of the words; and that the relation between music and ideas is not only a natural but a necessary and inevitable one. Imagination comes further into play, strengthening the analogical rapport; and so on, until we gradually perfect an almost scientific scheme of musical illustration. The most successful setting, then, is by that composer who can trace all these analogies of æsthetic expression between the arts, and can elaborate them in their most suggestive, delicate, and subtle nuances of musical characterisation. Nevertheless, the truth remains the same: that words have very little, if any necessary musical expression. This is demonstrated, if need be, by the curious instance of certain different settings of the same poetical subject by different composers, all of which—despite their often wide diversity of musical expression—have perhaps appeared equally truthful, characteristic, and penetrative; so much so, indeed, that each interpretation, away from the others, we might almost take to be the inevitable and only possibly perfect one.

THE ORGANISATION OF CHORAL UNIONS.

"Union is Strength" is a motto as true in Church-song as in anything else in the world, and it may be added that as a desire for union in general indicates advance from selfishness to brotherly love, so the desire for union in choral matters proves the advance from that too common but most pernicious self-sufficiency that shuts out all progress—to the ready mind that keeps both eye and ear open for any hint that a brother may be able to give by example or by word. A very early experience of the writer's was to hear a member of a choral committee propound the heresy that no association could look for the pence of pity and of sympathy until it was bowed down with debt. What a mistake! Whatever it ought to do, depend upon it the world rather inclines to the winning side, at present at least. No; if you are going in for choral association at all, begin by looking on the deficit as the dry-rot of the work—that from the smallest fibre will spread and spread till all sap and strength is eaten out. Don't listen when people tell you airily: "Oh, these things never pay; of course you will be on the wrong side with your accounts." There is no "of course" at all about it, be assured; the writer of these lines can say that he never had a deficit on any one of the many, many choral festivals and choral meetings, great or small, that he has carried through.

There are three offices that must be filled, those of Secretary, Treasurer, and Precentor. If three capable men are to be had, well. If but two, they must share the offices; if but one, he must fill all three. And all arrangements must be entrusted to these three, or two, or one; any suggestion may be sent in writing to the secretary by any member of the Union, for due consideration.

Let the treasurer begin by securing promises of annual subscriptions from all able and willing to help in the work, but let no subscription be asked of those who associate their choirs—the absolutely necessary expenses connected with enrolment ought to be held quite subscription enough without more direct payment.

By the time that the long winter nights have made weekly choir practices more regular, and so much longer than a quarter of an hour can be regularly spared for extra work, the book for the coming year's campaign must have been settled, arranged, printed, and distributed by the secretary, after due counsel with his brother officers. One word here on the shape and size of the book and its contents. It will be found both more economical and more convenient to take the octavo size. One sheet will be large enough to carry music and words of four hymns, and the Psalms pointed, besides the words of the anthem, and any necessary directions. If no date be put on this sheet, and an extra number of copies printed—which when the type is up can be done at very trifling increase of cost—the secretary will have by him, as years roll by, a very useful collection of sheets available for use at occasional services in the diocese.

An outer sheet—which to save confusion should vary in colour year by year—will also be needed. This should bear the date or dates and place or places of proposed choir gatherings on the first leaf, and the Preces (which it will be well to have stereotyped once for all) on the second leaf. These two sheets stitched together will be sold to the people on the Festival day, and ought to be a substantial source of revenue.

The choirs will generally need a copy of the anthem and service stitching in—generally, be it said, for it may be that the management may in their wisdom consider that the particular choirs proposing to unite in festival had better not be taken beyond hymn and chant, for which the two sheets will find ample room; for true, indeed, it is that though union may lift up to higher than the usual flight, yet there is nothing more injurious to singers than to take them floundering out of their depth to the absolute ingraining of faults which it is the special purpose of choral association to eradicate.

For the sake of economy, if for nothing else, the selection of anthem will probably be from that marvellous mine of useful little pieces, the three-halfpenny sheets of The Musical Times—that is to say, provided a four-part anthem is desired. For be it remembered that for choirs, or unions of choirs, where all the four parts are not to be had in due balance, there exist two-part anthems, notably those beautiful little compositions of the late Sir George Macfarren, arranged for boys and women against the men, which, under circumstances, will produce infinitely better effect than a four-part anthem practically reduced to two or even one part by want of balance of voices.

The service will be probably selected from among those many beautiful, simple, and fitting unison settings of the Canticles that such leading composers of true church music as Goss, Macfarren, Barnby, E. J. Hopkins, and others have given us.

Let it be at once granted that none but the most efficient choirs should attempt the four-part service that needs more than ordinary intelligence to prevent the words being obscured by the harmony and the points. But clear massive unison, sustained and coloured by illustrative organ accompaniment, enables the singer of even small skill to tell forth the words—if he feels their import—with a power and a purpose that awakens the hearer's sympathy. But to our book. The cover, with sheet inside, and inside that the three-halfpenny anthem and the unison service stitched in, and the secretary will have a complete set of music, all in one, that he may sell to choirs for sixpence, and yet leave margin for stamps and small expenses.

One word of earnest warning must be added before we leave the subject of the music. Let no copyright enter the book without permission having been previously sought and obtained. This is nothing more than a matter of common honesty. The work of a man's brain—whether retained or transferred to another—is as much property as the work of a man's fingers; you may as well take a watch as infringe a copyright. Church work, at any rate, should not be soiled by loose morality.

And now that the book is out, how shall it be got up, in such one way that the singers when they meet on the festival day shall be able to sing with one consent and one accord?

Shall a choirmaster be sent round to the choirs in turn? No; in practice this never answers, however well it looks in theory; for first and foremost, the expense of such a visiting choirmaster as will be accepted by the home teacher as capable of teaching what he himself cannot—if, indeed, this is ever possible—will be simply crushing. Secondly, "is he kitchen or parlour company?"—don't smile—is the parson's very practical and persistent question.

The method that meets most difficulties is for the various home teachers to meet at certain appointed centres and at certain appointed times, under a professional musician of undisputed ability—receiving his due professional fee out of the funds or by contribution from all who attend—there and then to be grounded in the way he will take the service on the festival day, for he will, almost as a matter of course, be the festival conductor. Let the attendance of the home teacher at these lessons be held as one of the chief terms of enrolment. Let none be excused; but, at the same time, let the attendance of ladies and others connected with the enrolled choirs be not only permitted, but solicited, so as to bring into play the powers of union while at the same time the all-needful one way is duly impressed on the minds of those who will have to pass it on to their choirs at home.

We now approach the festival day so long looked forward to. First as to the time of holding it. It will be wise not to fix this until the days have got long and warm enough for the service to be held in the evening, with the all-important full rehearsal in the afternoon. The workers will thus be saved a half-day, and a simple tea between rehearsal and service will take the place of the mid-day dinner, with all its difficulties. The interval between hay time and harvest is a time of comparative leisure that seems most suitable for festival fixtures in the country.

Both for help in arrangement in church, and for recognition out of it, it is most advisable that each choir should adopt a distinguishing badge for its singers.

At an ordinary choral festival the singers will consist of males, surpliced and unsurpliced, and females. It will be well to place all female singers in the front rows before the people, facing the East, and the males—surpliced before the unsurpliced—decani and cantoris. The surpliced alone will form the procession, if it be decided to have one, the rest of the singers uniting their voices as the procession reaches them. The formation—four boys to three men—each choir by itself, will give compactness and handiness to the procession.

If there be a recession at all, it is well for the choirs not to begin to leave their places till the last verse of the recessional is reached, and for the organist to continue in voluntary as long as may be needful; at the end of the service it is almost impossible to secure an orderly recession of any length.

The wise secretary, even in the anxieties of the festival service, will not forget the bogie Deficit. He will take care to have a voluntary before the Blessing amply long enough to enable every man, woman, and child in the church to have full opportunity to give or to refuse to give—a deliberate yes or no—and if when all accounts are got in and paid, there remains a balance—a good honest balance—what shall be done with it? Let it go—with such subscriptions and donations as can be obtained for the most excellent purpose—towards a benefit fund for the choirman whose choir is enrolled. A few days at the seaside after his own illness, or a something towards the doctor's bill after his children's illness might be a boon indeed. Alas, there are far too many occasions on which a £5 so got together would be most thankfully received; and doubly sweet would the grant be from the honest feeling that it was no pauper's pence that were doled out, but a part of the good fruit borne by brotherly association.

J. P. M.

We print another long letter from Mr. Torr, who has discovered for himself a new theory concerning Greek notation, which, as is pointed out by our correspondent, Mr. Bergholt, was discovered fifty years ago by Vincent, but being quite impracticable, has long since been forgotten. This theory, however, seems eminently satisfactory to Mr. Torr, since it has the great advantage of proving that the somewhat considerable literature on Greek music, which has arisen during the last fifty years through the labours of men of European reputation, might as well have never been written; and that the only piece of genuine early Greek music yet discovered is practically valueless to musicians. Before commenting on Mr. Torr's present letter, we may as well inform our readers that M. Gevaert, one of the greatest living authorities on Greek music, having examined M. Reinach's transcript of the Apollo Hymn, considers it "parfaitement exact" (Ménestrel, April 15). It is perfectly natural that Mr. Torr should try and show that we have not met his point as to whether Alypius recognised a "Phrygian scale as such"; for if he once accepts the view taken by every single writer, ancient or modern, that the Greeks possessed only fifteen scales, each of which was submitted to certain modifications, instead of forty-five, as he contends, his whole theory falls to the ground. Our readers can understand the English of the Greek words we quoted from Alypius, even if Mr. Torr cannot. His quibbles with regard to the A natural and D flat can also only be supported on the 45-scale theory; and we really cannot undertake to suddenly change our whole conception of the nature of the Greek notation at the bidding of even so original an investigator as Mr. Torr appears to be.

As far as we can see, Mr. Torr's theory takes no notice of the difference between fixed and moveable sounds; hence his difficulty with regard to K and I, which are both translated D. K is in this instance one of the moveable notes, and it can be tuned to D flat or D natural, or a note between. In some of the other tetrachords Mr. Torr mentions, I is the moveable and K the fixed note. By all means let Mr. Torr, if he wishes, consider that the moveable K cannot possibly have coincided with I. He will then have the satisfaction of producing the "unmelodious modulation" described by Pseudo-Euclid, p. 21, "When, in modulations, the sounds fall similarly, so that there is agreement in the pycnum, the modulation is melodious; but when the sounds are dissimilar, the modulation is unmelodious." Since there are in this hymn several modulations between the conjunct and disjunct system, it seems to us that we have at least as good grounds for accepting that position of K which will produce melodious modulation, as Mr. Torr has for contending that K and I must represent notes of different pitch. M. Reinach has explained (Bulletin de Correspondance Hellenique, 1893, p. 593) that he considers the notes K and I as homotones—i.e., two notes representing the same sound; and that when the composer modulated from the conjunct to the disjunct system, he would naturally retain the notation of the disjunct until he returned to the conjunct. Mr. Torr has, by contemplating the tables of Alypius, come to the conclusion that since there were twenty-one signs to each octave, there must have been notes of separate pitch for each letter; but he quite forgets to mention that two notes in each tetrachord were "moveable," and, under certain circumstances, would, as we have pointed out, coincide with others of different names. We come to the root of Mr. Torr's new theory in the sentence: "Of course, if Alypius had given the conjunct tetrachord in exactly the same form in every one of his chromatic scales, we should be justified in arguing that this single form must be interpreted in different ways to suit all the different forms that were actually in use. Alypius, however, uses two different forms." And Aristoxenus, p. 50, gives three different forms of the chromatic and one of the enharmonic tetrachord, to say nothing of "mixed" and other forms. According to Mr. Torr, Alypius (who, by the way, did not invent the notation, as Mr. Torr seems to think) ought to have given not two, but at least four different forms for the pycna of Aristoxenus; not to mention those of Ptolemy. We have, moreover, direct evidence from Aristoxenus himself (p.39) that the notation does not show the differences of intervals. As to whether the ancients found the nuances difficult, Aristides, probably quoting from Aristoxenus (Gevaert, p. 295), says (p. 19): "The most natural of the genera is the diatonic, which can be sung by all, even by the unlearned; the most artificial, the chroma, which only the learned can sing. In mentioning the diatonic genus generally, our meaning would surely be evident to any one except Mr. Torr. Since he does not mention the fact, he is evidently unaware that Ptolemy describes altogether five kinds of diatonic tetrachord, each of which, by the way, ought to have its own particular notation.

The usual form of chromatic genus during the classical period seems to have been the toniaion of Aristoxenus, which was identical with the chromatic scale of the Pythagoreans (Gevaert, I., 320). We have already pointed out that the notation does not indicate the particular tuning used in this or any other music. The passage in Aristides we referred Mr. Torr to on p. 23 has nothing whatever to do with the notation of Aristides on p. 22, to which we did not refer him. We wished to point out that Aristides describes the thirteen scales of Aristoxenus, the lowest notes of which, taken in order, form an octave of twelve semitones. What the difference is between the twelve equal semitones contained in the octave of Aristoxenus and the twelve mean semitones of modern equal temperament, perhaps Mr. Torr can explain. He may possibly have discovered that since Aristoxenus's tone, taken singly, was appreciably more than the sixth part of an octave, Aristoxenus's octave was appreciably larger than the modern octave, and that therefore it produced a decidedly appreciable discord. We willingly acknowledge that Mr. Torr has apparently scored a point in favour of his theory in connection with the soft chromatic of Ptolemy. But we have not discovered as yet that Ptolemy anywhere mentions his soft chromatic tetrachord as peculiar to the Dorian conjunct, or any other of the tetrachords in which the succession of letters we have noticed occurs. As a matter of fact, so close is the connection between the scale given by the white keys of our pianoforte from A to A, and the Greek system, that all those pycna whose lowest note would correspond with a black note on the pianoforte do not follow the alphabetical order in their three letters, but, skipping over the third, end on the fourth; while those which begin on a white key invariably have three letters in alphabetical order, representing originally not the soft chromatic, but the enharmonic genus. This is fully explained by Fortlage. As to the interval between proslambanomenos (B) and hypate hypaton (C♯) in the Iastian scale, both notes are fixed at the interval of a tone; and they have nothing to do with a pycnum. The example only serves to demonstrate still further the futility of Mr. Torr's theory. But our point of view is so entirely different from Mr. Torr's, that we can never hope to arrive at the same conclusions. We regard music as a development, an evolution of the human mind. We endeavour to arrive at the solution of its problems by tracing its historical development, and prefer to use that comparative method which has yielded the richest results in this and all other departments of scientific research. We make no claim to originality, but are content to sit at the feet of the great European savants; and we would recommend to Mr. Torr a wider course of reading than he seems to have as yet undertaken in the department of Greek music.

M. Kufferath's exhaustive monograph on "Tristan," in all respects a worthy companion volume to those from the same pen on "Lohengrin," "Die Walküre," "Siegfried," and "Parsifal," contains not a little fresh and interesting matter. Thus there is a hitherto unpublished letter from Wagner which illustrates in a most remarkable way the extraordinary and indomitable confidence in his genius which supported him through so many trials and disappointments. It bears the date, January 30, 1860, and is addressed to Madame Dustmann-Meyer, one of the artists whom he wished to retain for the production of "Tristan" in Paris, for at that moment, although the possibility of gaining a hearing for "Tannhäuser" was vaguely talked of, his chief desire was the production of the later work. "This week," writes Wagner, "will decide everything. I have left no stone unturned in order to realize my scheme of giving the first representation of "Tristan" in Paris. If, in the course of the next week, the material difficulties are overcome, all that remains for me is to know whether I can rely upon you and the few chosen souls who surround you. For the rest you need have no apprehension. I know what I am about, and I have never undertaken anything of this sort without being absolutely certain of success. No one can be a better judge on this point than myself. . . . As for difficulties—why one simply casts them aside." Another curious and hitherto unknown fact is mentioned by M. Kufferath in connection with Madame Schnorr, the original representative of Isolde. Her maiden name was Malvina Guarrigues, her father being descended from a French refugee who quitted his native land at the period of the revocation of Nantes. This refugee had a brother who made his home in England, anglicised his name to Garrick, and was the father of the famous actor. Madame Schnorr, it may be added, avowed the responsibility for breaking off the negotiations relative to the production of "Tristan" at Carlsruhe in 1859 solely on the ground of her anxiety as to the health of her husband, and the same anxiety was the source of a good deal of friction between her and Wagner in 1865 during the rehearsals at Munich. Just on the eve of the production Madame Schnorr was seized with hoarseness, and went off to Reichenhall to recruit with her husband. This delay exasperated Wagner, who bombarded them both with letters and telegrams to such an extent that Madame Schnorr at last let him know that she considered his behaviour gratuitous and ill-advised. For this Wagner never forgave her, and in his reminiscences of her husband does not even mention her name. On this M. Kufferath remarks "it is only little men who are lacking in magnanimity." How fully justified were Madame Schnorr's apprehensions was subsequently proved by the sudden breakdown and death of her gifted husband. The episode is worth mentioning, as it exemplifies the candour and impartiality of M. Kufferath. His immense admiration for the genius of Wagner, the artist, does not blind him to his imperfections as a man.

An interesting book might be written on the history of the orchestra regarded from a Darwinian standpoint. Of course we all know the influence which the progress of the art of composition, the improvements and inventions of instruments, and the ever-increasing prowess of performers have had upon orchestral music; but there are other far more curious points. The growth of bowed instruments, for instance, from one parent type which yet survives in Eastern countries; the innumerable "sports" and varieties, some of which have developed into distinct species, which have struggled—successfully in some cases—for permanent existence. The rise and prosperity of the viol family and its overthrow by its most despised member, the violin. The long career of the lute family and its decay, till now it is chiefly represented by the banjo. The vanishing of all varieties of brass wind instruments and their absorption by the saxhorn. Finally, the settling down of the myriad "wood-wind" instruments into the four principal and distinct families—flute, oboe, clarinet, and bassoon. All these are matters highly interesting and curious to consider, but there is also the development of the orchestra as a whole to be regarded in the same manner. Think of the time when composers wrote music which might either be sung or played, and if played then on any collection of instruments that happened to be handy. Up to the time of Haydn they were not at all particular as to what instruments the orchestra was to consist of, as may be seen by a consideration of most of Handel's scores. And the reverence with which we now-a-days insist upon using the exact kind of trumpet that Bach had, and the exact kind of horn that Mozart had is rather absurd when one reflects upon the rough coarse strings and terrible oboes used by these masters, the tone of which we should not dare to reproduce. Well, then we may notice how the different kinds of bands grew up, and what influences caused the development of certain fixed types—the brass band, or fanfare; the wind band, or harmonic; the string band as used in the concert-room, and that singular instance of the survival of the fittest, the English theatre band.

The genesis of the theatre band is worth giving; the causes which led to its creation being visible in operation at almost any time. Thus, suppose at a fashionable holiday resort a full band is engaged for the season, it is clear that as the visitors drop off the expenses of this band must be gradually reduced. The strings are first thinned off until there are three first and two second violins, one viola, one violoncello, and one bass; next two of the three trombones go. The second oboe, bassoon, and flute can next be dispensed with, and then the bass drum player, the tympanist playing all the percussion instruments at once. We are now reduced to single wood, horns (they are hardly heard: away with them!), two cornets, one trombone, drums, and the strings above mentioned; but further reductions are demanded. Why have so many fiddles? Two firsts and one second must suffice; the viola is a feeble affair and the violoncello plays much the same as the bass. So the survival of the fittest (or, rather, the loudest) at last brings us down to the octet theatre band: two first violins (one conducting), one second, no viola, no violoncello, and one bass; then a flute (who plays always on a piccolo in order to make more noise), a clarinet, a cornet, and a Jack-of-all-trades drummer, and for this wretched collection of instruments some hundreds of pieces of good music and many thousands of dances and operatic selections have been arranged and printed. And audiences have got so accustomed to this shrill thin affair that they positively resent a more artistic and suave combination. In fact, they only want a noise to cover that eminently disagreeable sound, the buzz of a crowd conversing between the acts. But the feelings of a theatre conductor who writes pretty ballet and incidental music for his pantomime and then has to score it for octet band are, we assure our readers, not to be envied. Experto crede.

Volapük, the introduction of which into the curriculum of an English Board School in the Midlands was once seriously discussed, and, unless we are greatly mistaken, actually attempted, is irretrievably dead; and its premature decease is almost to be regretted in the interest of the impresario confronted by the linguistic difficulties attendant on the performances of opera by a company containing at least as many nationalities as there are colours in the rainbow. Flotow's "Martha" was given the other day in New York, and this is how one of the leading American dailies comments on the performance: "Opera in English always was a strange thing, but as given just now at the Grand Opera House it is a stranger, a more unintelligible thing than ever before. In 'Martha,' last evening, Herr Behrens sang in Italian; Mdlle. Wolf, fresh from Sweden, attempted the vernacular, and might as well have sung the word 'Tändstickor' all night. For Mr. Payne Clark there exists apparently but one letter in the English language—viz., the letter 'a,' and, of course, he was about as understandable as the sweet singer from Sweden. . . . The whole performance was most spirited. It would have been quite artistic, too, had not the Queen's English been so grossly travestied by the principal performers." It is not necessary, however, to go to America to illustrate our point. Criticism in this regard should begin at home. Some of the finest performances at Covent Garden in the present season have been seriously impaired by the bi-lingual method adopted. But of one thing we are certain. Inartistic though it may be to have Marguerite singing in French to an Italian-speaking Siebel, the results are even more grotesque when, as in the performance of "Carmen," Italian singers, in the interests of uniformity, grapple with the French version in an accent alongside of which the pronunciation of Stratford-atte-Bowe is semi-Parisian.

The connection of science and art, which is so remarkable a feature of modern times, is curiously, nay, alarmingly illustrated by the letter of Mr. Lascelles Scott to the Times on the subject of the Waltham catastrophe. "The entire series of explosive nitro-substitution compounds," writes this erudite expert, "(including nitro-cellulose or 'gun-cotton,' nitro-glycerine, the picrates and their homologues, &c., separate and in mixtures) are liable to instant decomposition—i.e., 'explosion'—into their constituent gases under a variety of circumstances, some of which are not indicated in the faintest degree in any 'Woolwich regulations' or 'Home Office rules' yet promulgated. Moreover, although certain precautions pertaining to ignition, concussion, acidity, temperature, &c., are doubtless stringently enjoined, the practical methods recommended for carrying them into effect are in most instances lamentably inefficient, and, in some cases, of the most impotent character. All such nitro-compounds are capable of being exploded by the influence of vibration of one kind or another—some even by that of a particular musical note. But where do we find any useful official instructions upon this (in my opinion) important point?" The passage which we have italicised, in the immortal phrase of Count Smorltork, "surprises by himself." In ancient music—both Greek and mediæval—certain modes were prohibited, or at least discouraged, on the ground that they exerted an evil influence on the moral fibre of those who employed or listened to them. But now the progress of civilisation and science has brought us to a point at which the emission of certain individual notes is fraught with deadly risk to life and limb. The inevitable conclusion to which Mr. Lascelles Scott's revelations point is that the Government should insist on the possession of the sense of absolute pitch in all the workmen employed in the manufactories of these compounds. Failing that, the employment of dumb persons would be the safest way out of the difficulty.

We have always been constrained regretfully to admit that in picturesqueness and wealth of poetic imagery the English musical journalist is miles behind his American cousin. But never has our patriotism received so rude a shock as on perusing some criticisms that have been sent us on the Musical Festival held last May in Cincinnati. This is how the poet-critic of the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette begins, under the heading, in large capitals: "Music holds sway over the Queen City again":—

With all the panoply, pomp, and pageantry of Druidic days, when sacerdotal fires consumed the darkness on the eminences until they turned to Ætnas, the Queen of the West, attended by a vast and lustrous train, last evening in her lofty temple, commenced her biennial oblation to the fabled goddess. The priestess queen waved her white wand, and the concourse of attendant instruments and voices sent inspiring strains into the great vaulting temple, to the expressed gratification of the worshippers.

A solitary man, standing on an eminence commanding the views and vistas of a wooded wilderness, where mountain peaks immovable rift the dripping vapours and chilly canyons swallow up the sun's warm light; where waters shimmer with reflective [sic] light; silence, with a voiceless, yet impressive eloquence, proclaims its ancient regency, must needs be awed with inspiration into mute and holy reverence. But deeper was the feeling of the reflective spectator who found himself in presence of that throng last night in Music Hall—a multitude of human beings massed into a grand assemblage, a sea of humanity, each component particle scintillating with intelligence and life, garbed with rare and radiant vesture, gemmed with treasure-trove of ocean and vibrant with the spell of music.

The solitary observer, though hushed into reverential calm, feels his own supremacy over the lower kingdoms of the earth. But he who looked upon the multitude must have owned his littleness—a mere atom of the mass, a ripple on the sea, a leaf in the forest—and could not but be touched by a kind of solitude which crept upon him unawares until he found himself alone, surrounded by his fellow men.

The New York critic, Mr. Krehbiel, had, it would seem, the temerity to find fault with the chorus at this Festival; so we find among the "head-lines" in the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette for the following day, one very significant one: "Knives out for Krehbiel." We have not yet heard of any accident happening to Mr. Krehbiel, but we tremble for his safety. Let us hope, however, that the writer's sanguinary expression is to be interpreted in a purely Pickwickian sense. It would appear that Cincinnati is as famous for its music as for its pigs. At least this is what our critic tells us:—

And why should not the Queen of the West participate in the music of the spheres, when she herself stands on the over-topping pinnacle of this mundane atom of the universe, from which she sends her musical messengers athwart the land? Her people feel the dint of music, and when such a jubilee of the art is on, they feel a mounting pride as well, despite the humility of their motives in giving art in its simplicity an impetus. So the city is stirred from minaret to moat, and the heritage of divinity they know is theirs, even though its enjoyment is but transitory.

It is rather in the nature of a descent from the lofty altitudes attained in these poetic rhapsodies to find, as an appendix to each criticism, several columns of paragraphs on "Who were there, and what the ladies wore." The public of Cincinnati would seem to find peculiar satisfaction in fashionable tittle-tattle, if they take interest in such paragraphs as these:—

Miss Marguerite Lloyd's Florentine beauty shone to advantage in a yellow satin gown, with immense puffed sleeves.

Miss Eva Holloway was stately and blonde, in a handsome evening gown of black lace.

Better still is a paragraph anent one of the soloists:—

Mrs. Carl Alvés sang with her soul in her voice, and wore a white silk gown, with broad shoulder capes of green and gold embroidery.

Another Cincinnati paper, The Tribune, bursts into illustration. Messrs. Ben Davies and Watkin Mills are grossly libelled in a couple of so-called portraits, and for the composer of "Elijah" an intelligent sub-editor has served up a copy of the portrait of Mendelssohn's father, that serves as frontispiece to Henselt's book, "The Mendelssohn Family"!

The uncompromising devotees who swear by one particular composer and swear at most of the rest, may be recommended to take to heart the excellent words which fell from the Bishop of Chester in the course of his sermon on the 22nd ult. Preaching at the special public service which inaugurates the Festival, and at which Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was performed, Dr. Jayne said that they sometimes heard it whispered that the renown and influence of Mendelssohn was on the wane. But, as he added, they were able to take the measure of such an augury as that. It reminded him of the contrast drawn by Wordsworth many years ago between the short lived and superficial verdict of what claimed to be the public, but was really the verdict of an ephemeral coterie, and the weighty and permanent verdict of the people. "Could they doubt that the allegiance of the people was still firm to Mendelssohn, who rendered to them so great, so priceless a gift; meeting their taste, but refining and elevating it at the same time? Surely true wisdom was to be learned from the teaching of St. Paul, who told them that there was one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars. So there was one glory of Handel, one glory of Mozart, one glory of Wagner, and one of Mendelssohn; and God forbid that any one of those stars of song should be deposed from the firmament of our musical heaven." That, we take it, is a very sane and right-minded attitude, and may be commended to the consideration of the leaders as well as the rank and file of the musical world. A very happy illustration, we may add, of the Bishop's remarks may be found in the programme of the forthcoming Hereford Festival, at which Handel's "Messiah," a Symphony of Mozart, the Vorspiel to "Parsifal," and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" will all be given in the Cathedral.

Some notable performances were recently given at the Brussels Conservatoire by the ensemble classes for wind instruments. In the Trombone Class all the brass instruments (such as bass trumpet, tenor, bass and contra-bass tubas) are taught which Wagner introduced into the score of his "Ring of the Nibelung," and had partly constructed in accordance with his own directions. The parts for these instruments are only too often played on the ordinary trombones, and such other brass instruments as may be at the disposal of the conductor; and the peculiar tone-colour intended by the composer is not, in consequence, realised. The Brussels Conservatoire is ahead of all other music schools in adopting them as definite additions to the modern orchestra, and taking steps to train its pupils for the task of interpreting Wagner's superb score in exact accordance with the master's intentions. Under the direction of the professor of the class, M. Seha, the pupils played fragments from the "Rheingold," a Fantasia by M. Gilson, and a Scherzo by M. L. van Dam. Both these latter works were specially written for the occasion, and the tone-colour produced is said to have been extremely fine. An even more remarkable performance was that of Liszt's Fourteenth Rhapsodie, arranged for an orchestra of clarinets, including the small clarinet in E flat, the ordinary clarinet in B flat, bassett horn in F, alto clarinets in E flat, bass clarinets in low F, and last, not least, the pedal clarinet recently constructed by M. Besson, which has the compass of a five-stringed double-bass.

"After a prelude full of intense and bounding joy, saddened temporarily in the middle by a passing memory of the curse of the goddess, the second Act of 'Tannhäuser' opens with the beautiful scene in the minstrel's hall at the Wartberg." This is not an extract from an analytical programme, but it is a typical passage from a novel recently published under the title of "A Baireuth (sic) Pilgrimage," in which society small talk, flirtation, and a good deal of pseudonymous personalities alternate with descriptions of Wagner's operas, quotations from his libretti, disquisitions on the history of Bayreuth, and musical "shop" of all sorts. The idea is new, no doubt, and carried out with a good deal of cleverness, but we cannot persuade ourselves that it is altogether a satisfactory precedent. Certainly the devout Wagnerian will not altogether appreciate the comments of the Philistine English officer who, on coming out of the opera-house after the first Act of "Tristan," remarks: "I felt quite jolly and happy before I went in, and now—What business had the fat maid to go and take upon herself to mix up those drinks? I'm afraid she's done a lot of mischief. Those two were acting very straightforward before, but now—O let's go and have dinner; I'm sure we all want our dinner. It's a great take off of this place, the unearthly hours at which one meals."

MUSIC AND MUSKETRY.

"Here we will sit and let the sounds of music
Creep in our ears," wrote Shakespeare long ago;
Not sounds he might have christened "arquebusic,"
The noise of guns that modern hearers know.
The languid lute and the feeble flute;
Their work is undoubtedly done.
You can't dispute that they're meekly mute
When crushed by an eighty-one
Ton gun.

"If music be the food of love," he also Wrote long ago, "play on. That strain again;
It had a dying fall!" Now "supers" fall so,
Shot by the guns which roar a rough refrain.
The violin, in this deadly din,
All competition must shun;
It can't join in when, through thick and thin,
There thunders an eighty-one
Ton gun.

"Sweet bird," or man, "that shunn'st the noise of folly."
Say what would Milton think of such a din;
"Most musical"—perhaps!—"most melancholy."
Let's grin and bear it. Bear it; need we grin?
The ophicleide is compelled to hide
Its diminished head, though none
Its silence chide, when thus far and wide
We hear but that eighty-one
Ton gun.

"Music hath charms"—a still more trite quotation—
"To soothe the savage breast." This cannon's roar
Undoubtedly would charm a savage nation;
Their "tom-tom" music would be heard no more.
It overcomes even all the drums,
In this fast and furious fun,
The drum just hums, like a bee, when comes
That chord from the eighty-one
Ton gun.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

The Manchester Courier of June 27 noticed the Jubilee number of The Musical Times in a manner which, I feel sure, has laid everybody concerned in it under a sense of obligation. Among the personal references made by my contemporary was one not distantly connected with the present writer. "Mr. Joseph Bennett's services to musical criticism," said the Courier, "require no comment; happily, like the poor, he is ever with us; but it would be interesting, as a comparison, to receive from him to-day another essay on the theme of his first article to The Musical Times, written in July, 1873, entitled 'The Drift of Modern Music.'" The suggestion of the Courier is a good one, and I will see if it can be acted upon—not next month, which I am bent upon devoting to absolute idleness, but probably the next. It may be that I shall have to depart little from the opinions expressed in 1873, but much has happened since then. The children born as I wrote are now responsible men and women, and the writer, if he have in any degree used the opportunities of twenty-one years, should possess a clearer insight and command a larger horizon.

Every recognition of native musical talent is precious, and I am glad to learn that Mr. German's fine Norwich Symphony has been put upon Sir C. Hallé's list for next season; also that Mr. Henschel has made enquiries about the work with a view to its production by his Scottish orchestra. Truly the lines of English composers have now fallen to them in pleasant places!

A Gloucestershire professor of music sends me the following story as one of fact within his own recent experience: "A lady calls upon a teacher of the pianoforte with reference to some lessons considered desirable for her son, a boy of fifteen. The professor mentions, as his fee for twelve lessons, a sum under £2; whereupon the lady, looking much astonished, exclaims: 'Ye are rather dear in these parts. I could get the lad taught in Glasgae for 7½d. a lesson!'" No business was done, not even a saxpence going bang.

A correspondent, seeing the following advertisement in the Church Times, was moved to cut it out and post it to my address:—

"Harvest Anthem" and "Church Defence Hymn Tune," by Rev. —— ——, of ——, N.B. Highly commended by the late Sir Frederick Ouseley, Bart., but immensely disparaged by the Illustrated Church News (16th June). Price 1½d. each. Copies will be sent to first 100 clergy and honest-minded musicians who apply for them, post-free and without cost.

The reverend composer seems much put out by the criticism of the Illustrated Church News. His quid for the paper's quo may not be new, for condemnatory articles have been advertised by theatrical managers, as who should say: "This silly writer doesn't like the play, therefore it must be good." But though the retaliation is familiar some effect remains in it, and the balancing of Sir F. Ouseley against the religious journal's critic is decidedly ingenious. I should like to know the Rev. —— ——, of ——, N.B.

In a subsequent advertisement the reverend composer returned to the charge:—

The Illustrated Church News, versus Sir F. Ouseley, Bart. Send to —— for, post-free, gratuitous copies of Anthem and Hymn Tune sledge-hammered by Illustrated Church News, 16th June. The Rev. —— ought to feel crushed, but he isn't! Musicians proper, judge between Ouseley and Illustrated Church News.

The quarrel seems a pretty one, but, as far as the public are concerned, some evidence is lacking. What did Sir F. Ouseley say of the two pieces? What did the Illustrated Church News say? These queries answered, we can obtain the music gratuitously and do as the advertiser wishes—judge.

The Brecon and Radnor Express has a correspondent at Llandrindod Wells who may be able to tell the "Old Hundredth" from the "Post Horn Galop," but has not a universal capacity for distinguishing between things that differ. Noticing the performance of a certain orchestral band, he said: "The 'Hallelujah Chorus' or Haydn's 'Surprise,' was in itself a grand achievement and much appreciated." Inasmuch as the Concert took place on a Sunday afternoon, and was confined to sacred music, one marvels how the reporter could have got Haydn's "Surprise" into his head, and, much more, how he could have confounded it with the "Hallelujah" Chorus. But there is no fathoming some of these mysteries.

"Promenade" writes to a daily contemporary complaining that at an Exhibition now being held in London a selection from a certain comic opera is played every day. "Nor is this all," he writes, "for I also had to listen every time to a particular dance." The gentleman has an undoubted grievance, but it does not appear that he suspects the cause of it, though, in all probability, he knows what is meant by the term "royalty system."

With reference to the blemishes in the Handel Festival performance of "Israel in Egypt," it does not appear to have been known—I was myself in ignorance at the time—that Mr. Manns conducted that work under painful physical conditions. Since December last the accomplished chef d'orchestre has suffered more or less from rheumatism in the shoulders. This affection, aggravated by the necessary motion in conducting, became more than ever troublesome during the Festival week. On the Friday he could not lift his arm sufficiently, and at the beginning of the two choruses in the rendering of which faults appeared, the necessary indications had to be given with the fore-arm only. I more than suspect that Mr. Manns will visit me with his displeasure for making these facts public. On the other hand, I am sure they ought to be known, albeit nobody connects incapacity with the Crystal Palace conductor's distinguished name. Moreover, the reputation built up by conscientious and brilliant work through nearly, or quite, forty years, is not to be injured by two, or twice two, accidents.

One of the adjudicators at the recent Carnarvon Eisteddfod had a sharp experience. He is a knowledgable man in such matters, but overmastered by infectious garrulity, and not taking into account the disproportion between the volume of his voice and the size of the building, he delivered an adjudication which the people at the far end of the building, who could not hear it, thought too long. Under such conditions a Welsh audience never hesitates to speak out and the gentleman on the platform was forthwith told that he had said enough. He should have closed his mouth at once, but kept it open to say that the cultured part of the audience were happily in the front seats. At this the Welsh fire blazed up and there was a "scene," which ended only when the adjudicator withdrew his remark and apologised. It is pleasant to state that when next the gentleman appeared he was received with loud and general cheers.

The falling out of faithful friends,
Renewal is of love.

A correspondent of the Newcastle Weekly Chronicle, writing àpropos of a Richter Concert, said: "The programme included two Overtures by Wagner and one of Beethoven's Symphonies, and the union of these two names suggested to one of the audience the remark: 'Beethoven is the Leighton of music and Wagner its Walter Crane, its decorative artist.'" Has a shout of contempt and anger been recently heard in the Central Cemetery at Vienna and in the Garden at Bayreuth?

A correspondent writes complaining of "inadequate balance" in the orchestra of the recent Handel Festival. He says: "The proportions are to one clarinet, forty-six strings; to one horn, forty-two; to one cornet or trumpet, fifty-three; to one oboe or flute, thirty. The tympani, again, are hardly treated. Of the three players, two are taken to play the side-drums when those instruments are used. Surely three or four performers can be afforded for the military numbers!"

Live and learn about Wagner. I have read the following with much admiration: "Wagner often imitates foliage. In the Spring Song in 'Meistersinger,' those figures in the violins, hurrying one after the other with increasing pace towards its finish, generally arbitrary in the order, but never in the direction of its notes, always hurrying up, the last leap being always the longest, suggest the very shape of the crooked green sprouts pushing their way up and out of the twig on which they grow." "Prodigious!" But really now, the Bayreuth Master should be saved from his friends. Why should not an action for defamation lie against the writer just quoted? I may be reminded that Wagner makes his orchestra imitate the growls of Fafner the Worm. The reminder is not necessary. Shall I ever forget the fact? Besides, the poor beast's inarticulate noises cannot be mistaken as intending anything else.

I have received from the authoress, Kate Stanway, a little book entitled "Reminiscences of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah'" (Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent and Co.). The word "Reminiscences" is hardly well-chosen, because the writer gives a picture of that which is, not recollections of that which has passed. In effect, Miss Stanway here describes Mendelssohn's great oratorio, principally with reference to its drama, and but incidentally as regards the music. Her work, therefore, is not addressed to the musical student so much as to the lover of oratorio, before whom it sets, with considerable graphic force, the series of events treated by Mendelssohn. I am tempted to make an extract as an example of the writer's method. Miss Stanway thus begins her remarks upon the second part of "Elijah":

The scene is now empty of all human presence; it appears to be the first blush of dawn on the hill-side, already smiling with dainty verdure after the gift of the much needed rain. A solemn silence broods on the face of the resuscitated earth; the infant day, fresh from the Creator's hand, is smiling in tender beauty, as yet unsullied by the contaminating influence of man's iniquity. A strain of music presently steals upon the morning air—music soft as the first breath of spring; music instinct with a rapturous sweetness that touches one's inmost soul. A voice blends with this exquisite accompaniment, beautiful indeed, but trembling with the pathos that expresses the burden of a nameless pain, too deep for tears. This voice is full of the purest tenderness of human love, and the most profound compassion of the Divine; yearning over the fickle, idolatrous nation which is still cherished, despite its many and grievous transgressions, by the infinite heart of God. It seems to have the same sort of sadness in its few touching words that tinctured the mournful lamentation of the Man of Sorrows, centuries later, over the fair city, the joy of the whole earth, as He, with bitter tears, foretold her certain doom.

Without entering upon details of literary criticism, I recommend this little book as a useful preparation for hearing the Oratorio, and as especially fit for young people who are about to attend a performance of "Elijah" for the first time. It will give them a poetic conception of the subject and teach them the significance of its various events.

The Miss Stanway just referred to is the adopted daughter of Mrs. Jeanie M. Hale, who, as Miss Stevens, took part in the first performance of "Elijah" at the Birmingham Festival of 1846, on which occasion she sang in the double quartet, "For He shall give His angels." Mrs. Hale knew Mendelssohn personally, and still treasures a book of Studies in which the great Master inscribed her name with his "kindest regards." Three years since I had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Hale in Birmingham Town Hall, and of hearing from her some recollections of the memorable performance wherein she took part now nearly half-a-century ago.

I note that Mr. Wegefarth, an ingenious American, has patented a new central pedal which, when pressed, brings the hammers nearer to the strings, and so lessens the tone without muffling it. The pedal locks automatically, and is unlocked by slightly pressing the ordinary "soft" pedal. One man can take a horse to water, but a hundred cannot make the animal drink. Our modern pianists don't want the tone lessened, and they won't use Mr. Wegefarth's invention. All the same, there is an advantage in the appliance which the next-door neighbour will appreciate should it ever come into vogue.

My friend, Mr. Tomlins, and the Chicago Apollo Club have come together again. They parted awhile ago on a question of enhanced salary; whereupon, so says the Indicator, certain rich men threatened to withdraw their support, and the club gave way. The Indicator remarks that Mr. Tomlins "worships the muse to most excellent advantage," pointing out that he is director of four societies, as well as teacher of numerous classes. What of all that! The Chicago people are smart enough, and if they could get a better man than Mr. Tomlins for the same money they would not hesitate to do so. I have attended a performance by the Apollo Club, and quite sympathise with the "certain rich men" who preferred to "let well alone."

The following may be fresh or stale. I do not know, but will venture it. It purports to be an extract from a novel: "Henry reclined in the easy chair for an hour or more, watching the taper fingers of the woman he adored as they meandered over the ivory keys, calling forth the sweet melodies of Beethoven, Mozart, and Schopenhauer."

I have just read some remarks by Sidney Lanier upon Robert Schumann. They are not only worth transcribing, but considering. The first passage will probably be regarded by most readers as mere "tall talk":

What I do mean is that his (Schumann's) sympathies were not big enough; he did not go through the awful struggle of genius, and lash and storm and beat about until his soul was grown large enough to embrace the whole of life and the all of things; that is to say, large enough to appreciate (if even without understanding) the magnificent designs of God, and tall enough to stand in the trough of the awful cross-waves of circumstance and look over their heights along the whole sea of God's manifold acts, and deep enough to admit the Peace that passeth understanding.

The meaning of this is, perhaps, found, with less froth, in another paragraph:

I cannot find that his life was great as a whole; I cannot see him caring for his land, for the poor, for religion, for humanity. He was always a restless soul, and the ceaseless wear of incompleteness finally killed as a maniac him whom a broader love might have kept alive as a glorious artist to this day.

The principle upon which Lanier thus judges Schumann may be found in a pregnant passage which certainly supplies thought with food:

The truth is the world does not require enough at the hands of genius. Under the special plea of greater sensibilities, and of consequent greater temptations, it excuses its gifted ones, and even sometimes makes a law of their weakness.* But this is wrong; the sensibility of genius is just as much greater to high emotions as to low ones, and, while it subjects to stronger temptations, it at the same time interposes—if it will—stronger considerations for resistance.

Clearly Lanier would not have us treat a man of genius as a spoiled child. But suppose we whipped him into line with the rest of mankind, would he be half as engaging or anything like as useful in his special vocation?

Princess Alice of Hesse has accepted from Mr. Hamilton Clarke the dedication of a "Bridal March," notwithstanding previous refusal of several other applications. The fact will be regarded as a high compliment to the composer.

The recent death of Madame Catherine Penna brings back recollections of an artist whom the Fates scarcely treated with the kindness she deserved. One who knew her intimately writes to me:

As a reader of vocal music she has rarely been surpassed. It was because she was so thoroughly to be depended upon in this respect that the late Sir Julius Benedict engaged her, when still in her teens, as a soprano for a Norwich Festival after the list of artists had been completed, he fearing that the principal soprano (Madame Albani), then out of health, might not be able to fulfil her engagement. And it was this faculty which so greatly gratified Rubinstein when she sang some of his songs at a Philharmonic Concert. Probably her wedded life—she was twice married—is responsible for the musical world having been deprived of talent which, had its exercise been thoroughly systematic, would have placed its possessor in a prominent position.

The moral of the last sentence for lady artists already wedded to Music is that they should not commit bigamy and marry a mere man.

Advance, Australia! A Leipzig correspondent, to whom I have often been indebted for information about music in the Saxon city, sends particulars of a Recital given lately by Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, a Melbourne pianist. The performance, it appears, took place under the auspices of the Sterndale Bennett Society, which from time to time does good service in furthering the interests of British art. Mr. Hutcheson was, from 1886 to 1890, a pupil of Reinecke, Jadassohn, and Zwintzscher, at the Leipzig Conservatorium, afterwards making a concert-tour in his native land and then settling down at Weimar, where he took further lessons from Stavenhagen. My correspondent writes: "His technical skill is very considerable; his touch is warm and sympathetic, the pp passages showing no signs of thinness, while the ff's are not thumped out. It cannot be denied that his readings are musically good, and free from affectation and bad taste." I notice that the young Australian's programme contained a Scherzo in E flat by the Hungarian, Von Buttzkay, and an arrangement, by himself, of nothing less than Wagner's "Walkürenritt." Mr. Hutcheson has his life before him, but he cannot afford to waste time in such barren exercises as the last-named. As Madame Roland invoked Freedom, so, in view of the "Walkürenritt" for the pianoforte, am I disposed to invoke the outraged Genius of that much abused instrument.

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.

When one sits down to chronicle an event which took place a month ago, a depressing sense of belatedness weighs upon mind and spirit, equal to, though not quite like that which a diarist feels when he addresses himself to the task of writing up the blank and reproachful pages of his book. Four weeks back is almost antiquity in these days, so that, unless one has a double dose of the historic sense, or of dutifulness, the temptation is to say "What does it matter? All these things have been done and are forgotten!" But The Musical Times must not be a blank in any degree to the future searcher of its pages.

Our issue for July contained a notice of the general rehearsal at the Crystal Palace on June 22, and we now resume with a reference to the performance of "The Messiah," on the 25th, before an audience numbering 20,375 persons. A note of satisfaction with the dimensions of the crowd must first be sounded, since to look upon the many thousands present was to measure, in some degree, the continued popularity of a classic which has done much to keep English taste steady. Amid all the changes that have come over music, some good and some the reverse, "The Messiah" holds its own, and bids fair to stand firm in future, like the poet's "tall rock," which "midway leaves the storm." The performance came fully up to the standard of these occasions, the greater choruses, such as "For unto us," "Worthy is the Lamb," the "Amen," and the "Hallelujah" making all their old impression. With their thundering voices these masterpieces silence all cavil, or send it to mutter feebly in a corner, where there are none to heed. The solos were shared by Madame Albani, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Santley. It is unnecessary to go into details about the singing of these accustomed artists, but note must be made of the tenor's very successful début on the Handel Festival platform, and of the veteran Santley's superb singing throughout the Oratorio, yet more especially in "Why do the nations." Apart from some natural decay of voice, the great baritone made no finer effect in his best days. He was most enthusiastically applauded by a sympathetic audience. Mr. Manns, though suffering from rheumatism in the shoulders, kept his forces well together by vigorous gesture and instant readiness when the army showed signs of wavering.

The number of visitors on the Selection Day (June 27) was 21,139, being an advance upon the figures of "The Messiah" audience. This should be explained, perhaps, less by reference to the novelties in the programme than to the fact that the managers concentrated the strength of their soloists, of whom the following took part in the proceedings: Madame Albani, Madame Melba, Madame Marian McKenzie, Miss Clara Samuell, Miss Ella Russell, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Santley. There was no resisting such a combination as this, and hence the marked rise in attendance. Much care had evidently been taken with the programme, wherein figured choice extracts from "Deborah," "Judas Maccabæus," "Jephtha," "Samson," "Joshua," "Solomon," "Serse," "Acis and Galatea," "Ottone," "Ezio," and "St. Cecilia's Day." The master's sacred and secular works were thus laid almost equally under contribution. As may be supposed, the majority of the selections consisted of old favourites, and greedily were these heard, whether delivered by such consummate artists as Albani, Lloyd, and Santley, or by the stupendous chorus and orchestra. Among additions to the repertory of these Festivals was the Sixth Concerto for strings, oboes, bassoons, and organ. Few, if any, among the audience had before made the acquaintance of this piece, the interest of which, perhaps, is greater for the musical antiquary than for the average amateur. A performance of the Concerto under the precise conditions for which it was written would be attractive, but is not possible. The oboe of Handel's day, for example, exists no longer, and, as far as we are aware, no trustworthy specimen can be found as a model for reproduction. Another revival was that of the fine air, "Vinto è l'amor," from "Ottone," to which Miss Ella Russell did ample justice. The Violin Sonata in A had another hearing, with the solo played by all the violins in the orchestra. It, however, came short of the usual effect for reasons much less evident than the fact. There were many vocal solos, as the array of artists indicates, but by musicians attraction was most largely found in the choruses. The giant choir had only to speak in order to dwarf all else.

"Israel in Egypt" closed the Festival (June 29), and it is curious as showing how little figures can be depended upon as data in these cases that the great choral Oratorio which, three years ago, drew the largest audience now attracted the smallest. The attendance was 18,720, as against over 22,000 in 1891. Possibly the falling off was due to the special combination of solo talent on the Selection Day. Although the performance was not free from defects, one chorus having to be started afresh, much was done in a style of majestic grandeur possible only on these occasions; while it is remarkable that the more difficult choruses, such as "He led them through the deep," were, in several cases, the most successfully attacked. How the "Hailstone," "The horse and his rider," and other favourite numbers were given there can be no more need to tell than there is necessity to demonstrate that their effect was unique. The solos were entrusted to Miss Anna Williams, Miss Clara Butt, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Black, and Mr. Salmond. Miss Butt, who appeared for the first time at a Handel Festival, acquitted herself very creditably in "Thou shalt bring them in," and Mr. Lloyd excited his audience to enthusiasm, as usual, in "The enemy said." The Oratorio was preceded by a selection from the funeral anthem "The ways of Zion do mourn." A better choice might have been made, but, no doubt, the managers were influenced by the fact that Handel himself had associated this music with his great Oratorio. There is little more to say. Mr. Manns may generally be congratulated upon the result of his arduous labours, and the Crystal Palace Company upon another demonstration of successful management. The total attendance was 76,406.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

Mr. Cowen's "Signa" was produced here on June 30, the four acts of which it originally consisted having been condensed into two. The work was described so fully in our issues for January and December, 1893—the former containing a thematic analysis, and the latter an account of the production of "Signa" in Milan—that our task on the present occasion is a light one. We have but to record the excellent impression made by the charm of the first act (which is mainly lyrical and contains several melodies that will well bear detachment from the score) and the dramatic power of the second. We cannot admit that the libretto as it stands does justice to the novel, and especially to the central idea of the tale; the characters of both Gemma and Signa are much too sketchy. Madame Nuovina played and sang with customary earnestness as the pleasure-loving heroine, but did not seem to have studied the character at all. Mr. Ben Davies was of course not an ideal Signa in appearance, but his artistic singing made part amends, and in the last scene he acted with genuine power. Mr. Ancona was an excellent Bruno, in a vocal sense especially; and Mr. Castlemary was quite satisfactory in the small part of Sartorio. Mr. Cowen conducted.

Next to Verdi's "Falstaff," the most significant of the numerous novelties which Sir Augustus Harris has presented to his subscribers this season is "L'Attaque du Moulin," which was first performed at Covent Garden on the 4th ult., and was at once received with a chorus of approval, not a dissentient voice being heard. This is the more remarkable as Mr. Bruneau's previous work, "Le Rêve," was very adversely criticised, as the outcome of a musician, talented certainly, but with no sense of discipline or beauty. But apparently the composer has sown his wild oats and is now disposed to turn his undoubted gifts to advantage. As in "Le Rêve," he has found inspiration from a romance from the pen of Mr. Zola, but in "L'Attaque du Moulin," in place of religious mysticism, we have a story palpitating with human interest and scenes taken from life. Obviously in this episode from "Les Soirées de Médan," the aim of the eminent French author has been to contrast the blessings of peace with the horrors and sinfulness of war. Placing the scene in the sunny province of Lorraine in the summer of 1870, he shows us the quaint betrothal ceremonies observed in the district, rudely interrupted by the announcement that war has been declared between France and Germany. From thence all is sorrow and crime; the most wicked acts are perpetrated, not from innate viciousness on the part of any of the characters, but in obedience to the terrible laws of warfare, and a sterner object-lesson could not be imagined. In illustration of this painful, but strikingly humanitarian romance Mr. Bruneau has penned a score that must rank among the most original, picturesque, and beautiful among lyric dramas produced during the last thirty or forty years; and it is especially remarkable as being by far the most successful exemplification of the Wagnerian method that has yet appeared. Other composers have used the fascinating device of leading themes, but the French musician now develops them, not, perhaps, with the contrapuntal skill of the Bayreuth master, but still with much ingenuity. The first act is all cheerfulness and peace until nearly the close. We have motives suggestive of rural prosperity, the merry hum of a mill-wheel, honest labour, rustic love, and so forth. All these are twined together very effectively, until the ominous roll of a drum foreshadows the outbreak of hostilities, and the first act ends with a fine declamatory solo for the heroine, Françoise's foster-mother, Marcelline, in which the wretched consequences of war are described in glowing terms. In the second act the genuine trumpet calls of the French and Prussian troops are heard, and we note a beautiful love duet and a weird song for a lonely German sentry, reminiscent of the Irish sailor's ditty at the opening of "Tristan und Isolde." In the third the tragedy deepens, the principal motives are employed with increased effect, and the hymn-like chorus sung over the body of the cruelly slaughtered sentry is singularly impressive. But the climax of musical effect is reached in the last act, in which there are two beautiful duets and a concerted piece in which genius and musicianship are equally displayed. "L'Attaque du Moulin" appropriately ends with a harsh motive indicative of war, a conspicuous interval in which is the augmented fourth, known to the ancients as "tritonus est diabolus." From first to last the orchestration is truly delightful, the voices being gently supported, but never overpowered. As regards the performance, the finest embodiments were those of the old miller by Mr. Bouvet, and the foster-mother by Madame Delna, whose superb mezzo-soprano voice and fine theatrical presence and method must certainly ensure her a successful career in this country. Mr. Cossira, Mr. Albers, and Mr. Bonnard did well in comparatively minor parts. "L'Attaque du Moulin" will not quickly be placed on the shelf.

There is little to be said respecting the revivals of Bemberg's "Elaine," on the 7th, and Verdi's "Aïda," on the 17th ult. In the French composer's pretty, though not very original opera, Madame Melba and Mr. Jean de Reszke both sang superbly, and to the latter has been transferred the air "O douce nuit," in the first act. The whole of the tournament scene, which was the weakest portion of the opera, has been wisely eliminated. If Verdi's beautiful Oriental opera failed to draw a full house, the reason was probably due to the representatives of the two principal characters, the Ethiopian slave and Radames, for we cannot believe that the public can tire of the exquisite music. Miss Giulia Ravogli, Mr. Edouard de Reszke, Mr. Plançon, and Mr. Maggi, the last-named a new baritone of considerable merit, were all admirable, and the general performance afforded no loophole for adverse criticism.

We have now to speak briefly of the last of the list of novelties. This, happily, was only a one-act opera, "The Lady of Longford," libretto in English by Sir Augustus Harris and Mr. Frederic Weatherly, Italian version by Mr. Mazzucato, and music by Mr. Emil Bach, whose "Irmengarda," it may be remembered, was received with the faint praise which proverbially has an unpleasant effect. Let us hasten to say that Mr. Bach's later effort shows a marked improvement in certain respects. In "Irmengarda" the sudden and needless shiftings of tonality were sometimes positively ear-torturing, but the restlessness in "The Lady of Longford" is far less painful, though occasionally the composer moves from one key to another without any apparent reason. The drama, or rather episode, takes place just after the battle of Naseby, when the royalist Earl is flying for his life, hotly pursued by the Roundheads, as Cromwell has set a price upon his head. But their colonel is fired by the Countess's beauty, and offers to spare her husband's life under conditions which she naturally rejects with scorn, and eventually the Earl, emerging from his hiding-place, attacks the Colonel, but after a short, sharp combat he is slain. The lady, seizing her dead lord's dagger, stabs the Roundhead to the heart as he rushes to embrace her, and so this tragic little operetta ends. The music is nowhere striking, but it is fairly melodious, the best portions being the Roundhead's air, with its recurrent theme to the words "Man is mortal, my dear Madam," and the love passages between the Earl, the Countess, and their little girl. Mr. Alvarez, Madame Eames, and Mr. Edouard de Reszke were all highly effective in the three principal characters on the 21st ult., and the part of the child, Muriel, was prettily sung by Miss Evelyn Hughes. As we cannot at present speak of the concluding performances, a summing up of an eventful season may be deferred until our next number.

GERMAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

As the largest audience of the season was attracted by Wagner's "Tannhäuser," on June 26, it would seem that the thick and thin partisans of the Bayreuth master and the "moderates" are in accord over this work. Unfortunately we are unable to speak in very favourable terms respecting the performance. We have really never had as yet a thoroughly satisfying interpretation of this opera in London, and have yet to wait for it. That now under consideration suffered much from the faulty vocalisation of Mr. Alvary in the titular part. The German tenor must surely have been unwell, for he was rarely in tune from first to last. Mrs. Klafsky was rather too imposing as Elizabeth, and Miss Gherlsen, on the other hand, too girlish for the part of Venus. The two rôles should have been reversed. Mr. David Bispham was admirable as Wolfram, alike in singing and in his general conception of the part, and there was no ground for complaint against the representatives of the minor characters; but the chorus and scenic arrangements left much to desire, and the omission of the chorus of younger pilgrims made nonsense of the final scene. There were meritorious features in the performance of "Lohengrin," on the 3rd ult. Mr. Alvary acted impressively as the Knight of the Swan, but his singing was again defective; Mrs. Klafsky was an ideal Elsa, rendering the music faultlessly, and endowing the conception with all the womanly sweetness it demands. A more delightful performance of her part in the bridal duet it would be impossible to conceive, and it may be noted this scene was given without the excisions usually made. Miss Olitzka was an intelligent and even fascinating Ortrud, so accounting for the infatuation of Telramund, a part well played, as usual, by Mr. Dufriche. The chorus sang in some language it was impossible to determine, but we believe it was meant to be Italian. One of the best performances of the series was that of "Fidelio," on the 7th ult.; but we need not linger over it, as Mrs. Klafsky's unsurpassable embodiment of the devoted wife has already been discussed, and there was nothing in the Florestan of Mr. Alvary, the Pizarro of Mr. David Bispham, the Rocco of Mr. Wiegand, or the Marcellina of Miss Gelber to demand criticism in detail, all being satisfactory in their respective duties. The same cannot be said of the chorus; but Beethoven's accompaniments and the Overtures (Nos. 3 and 4) were played in spirited style under Herr Lohse. Three days later Weber's "Der Freischütz" was revived, after being shelved for ten years, save for a performance by pupils of the Royal College of Music in 1887. Why this master-work should suffer such neglect here it is difficult to determine, for in Germany it is still popular, and Weber may certainly be regarded as a forerunner of Wagner. Mr. Alvary was in better voice on this occasion, and sang, as well as acted, with effect in the part of Max, better known in England as Rodolph; Mrs. Klafsky was splendid in every respect as Agathe, but Miss Elise Kutscherra's voice is somewhat too hard for the pretty part of Aennchen. Mr. Wiegand as Kaspar and Mr. Bispham as the Prince were wholly commendable, and it was a treat to hear the dialogue finely declaimed in place of the bald recitatives. The favourite overture and the accompaniments generally were rendered with much vigour under Herr Lohse's direction. The series of operas in German have met with acceptance from the public, and there have been several repetition performances. Next year Sir Augustus Harris will, in all probability, arrange a season on a more extended scale.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

The programme of the last Concert, which was given on June 25, at St. James's Hall, contained plenty that was good, but nothing that even by courtesy could be called new. It speaks well for the patrons of these Concerts that the mere prospect of hearing such familiar works as Beethoven's C minor Symphony and excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas, that have been heard again and again, should have induced them to assemble in numbers that quite inconveniently filled the hall. And, of course, the fact speaks with trumpet tongue in praise of the Conductor—for those who best love great works can least endure to hear them inadequately performed. There was no falling off in this respect on the occasion in question, and Herr Richter's summer season had, in consequence, but one fault—its brevity. We are promised an autumn series, however, and in this must find consolation.

THE NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

To get at the edible part of an onion it is necessary to strip off several coats. A like process has now to be performed in connection with the Eisteddfod held at Carnarvon on the 10th ult. and three following days. First, I peel away the Gorsedd coat, and throw it aside as of no present concern. Similarly I deal with the Royal visit coat, with the competitions coat (other than that of musical competitions), and the speeches coat. This done I have left what, for my immediate purpose, is the core—that is to say, the music. If I am critical as to some points, it must not be supposed that I am also malicious. I feel too much sympathy with Welsh efforts for that. Also, I have too much real desire for their success to pass over obvious defects.

The Eisteddfod programme included a series of four Evening Concerts, at which I will glance in order of occurrence. The first was devoted to Handel's "Samson"—a very good choice of music suited to the public and to the means of execution, which included a fairly competent orchestra of thirty-seven performers, for the most part imported from Liverpool, and a local chorus of 220 voices trained by a Carnarvon organist and choirmaster, Mr. John Williams. The orchestra, having no Welsh significance, may be passed over with an expression of regret that North Wales is still obliged to go across the border for such a body. On the other hand, the chorus demands notice, and chiefly approving notice, since it turned out to be a competent array of singers, with good voices and abundant spirit. So much was expected in a land of song, and so much was duly forthcoming. As to the soloists, three—Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Daniel Price, and a tenor substitute for Mr. M. Humphreys—were Welsh, and two—Madame Annie Marriott and Mr. Watkin Mills—were English. The general performance may briefly be described as scoring one to the good. It was, in point of fact, highly creditable. The second programme contained a miscellaneous collection of vocal and instrumental pieces, in which six Welsh composers were represented—namely, John Thomas, R. S. Hughes, J. H. Roberts, Dyved Lewis, Dr. Parry (Cardiff), and C. Francis Lloyd. Associated with these, and standing for art foreign to Wales, were Stephen Adams, Handel, Gounod, Beethoven, Verdi, Sullivan, and Lucantoni. As may be supposed, the Concert, however pleasurable, was not very profitable. Such a jumble of styles and characters makes no definite impression, save one of uneasiness in the region of musical digestion.

The third Concert was, in its nature and intention, of considerable importance, being purely Welsh. It had as subject an Oratorio, "Dewi Sant" ("St. David"), composed by Mr. David Jenkins; as principal soloists a quintet of Welsh singers—Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Mary Thomas, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Norman Jones, and Mr. David Hughes; and the work was sung in the Welsh language. To this supreme demonstration of native talent everything should have given place. But the whole business was grossly mismanaged and ended in a dire fiasco. It seems a strange thing that our Welsh friends can never succeed in reducing the Eisteddfod procedure to order. Nay, it is a strange thing, especially as the chaos continues year after year, and nobody knows what a moment may bring forth at any stage of the annual gathering. When the morning began (at 10 a.m.) the chairman, Lord Mostyn, warned all and sundry that heavy work lay before, but so invincible is the dawdling and orating on these occasions that the sitting did not end till 7 p.m.—an hour later than the advertised time of beginning the Concert. The result was disaster all round. "Dewi Sant" had to be "cut" in haste and confusion; the great audience began to melt away shortly after the performance began, by the defection of persons who had to catch trains, and the evening, which should have brought a triumph to Welsh talent, raised, instead, a memorial to Welsh mismanagement. These may seem harsh words. I cannot help it, for every one of them was richly deserved. For the composer and his executants, one can have real sympathy, because it is not possible to do justice to either. I decline, after calling upon memory which supplies nothing but confusion, to pass judgment upon Mr. Jenkins's Oratorio, which, I trust, may next be heard where something approaching to order prevails. The fourth Concert was as mixed as the second, and calls for no notice whatever.

Turning to the competitive musical exercises, let me state at once that neither does space allow nor the importance of the facts require a detailed account. There were contests in the curious art of penillion singing, in vocal solos for all voices, in pianoforte playing, in instrumental quartet playing, in chorus singing by male, female, and mixed voices, in harp playing, in various forms of composition, and so on. Some of these were satisfactory; others were not, and in particular was I disappointed with the quality of the vocal solo competitors. Apart from a few soprani, the average of merit shown was unusually low, notwithstanding the "weeding" process to which the competitors had been subjected. A few of the instrumental contests were satisfactory, and the general standard of the brass bands which put in an appearance was considerable. With regard to the choral competitions, around which public interest chiefly gathered, I have to mention the merits and defects with which critics of Eisteddfod doings are familiar. Again was enthusiasm conspicuous, and with it vocal power, emphasis, careful training in the observance of expression marks, and, generally speaking, a high figure of discipline. But Welsh choirs, perhaps from defect of temperament, are given to exaggeration. In some cases an excess of energy carried the singers into a key above that in which they started; in others it caused serious defects of intonation. Until Welsh amateurs learn what restraint means they are not likely to improve on the Carnarvon form, and it seems to me that this important lesson will not be mastered until the conductors cease to stimulate their followers by excess of gesture. There is no reason in the world why they should fling themselves about like dancing dervishes, but every reason why, by calmness of demeanour, they should set an example of self-possession. Enthusiasm is a precious quality; it is also a dangerous one, and needs most careful regulation. On the whole, I am unable to look back upon the Carnarvon musical exercises with large satisfaction.

FESTIVAL OF NORTH-EASTERN CATHEDRAL CHOIRS AT DURHAM.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

The annual Festival Service of the North-Eastern Cathedral Choirs' Association was held on the 17th ult. Like its older and far more important prototype in the Western counties, three cities—York, Durham, and Ripon—are in alternation the scene of this event, and on this occasion it fell to the turn of the second-named of these cities. "Huge and vast" as the Cathedral of St. Cuthbert has been styled by Scott, its vastness is attributable more to its commanding position than to its actual dimensions; and it must be confessed that it is by no means so well adapted for musical performances on a large scale as might be supposed. The nave and choir are too narrow to admit a large chorus, who have to be stowed away in the transepts, so that the body of sound reaching the congregation on these occasions is far less than would be expected from the number of the singers. In addition to the nucleus formed by the Cathedral choirs of York, Durham, and Ripon, together with the more recent foundations of Newcastle and Wakefield, not a few Parish Church choirs took part in the service. The towns and villages thus represented in the chorus were Berwick, Belmont, Bishop Auckland, Bishop Middleham, Brancepeth, Brandon, Chester-le-Street, Dewsbury, Dipton, Durham (St. Oswald's), Earsdon, Haverton Hill, Heworth, Lamesley, Long Benton, Middleton, Newbottle, Newburn, Newcastle (St. Cuthbert's), New Seaham, Norton, Pittington, Sacriston, Seaham Harbour, Trimdon, Washington, Willington, Wingate, and Wolsingham; the entire chorus numbering some 950 voices. The mention of so many names indicates the value of the Festival in influencing for good the church music of the North. In place of the anthem, Mendelssohn's setting of the 95th Psalm, "O come, let us worship," was sung. Considering the practical difficulties of the situation, the distance of the outlying portions of the chorus from each other, and the necessity laid upon the organist of proceeding more by faith than by sight, the performance was thoroughly satisfactory. In some of the imitative passages there was a slight unsteadiness, but this was very soon overcome, and, as a whole, the choruses were smoothly sung. Though it would be absurd to expect ordinary Parish Church choirs to undertake in a general way music of this character, the discipline to which those who assisted must have been subjected in order to arrive at such a degree of proficiency must, as we have already suggested, have a good effect on the church music of the district, a result which may be taken as one of the primary objects of the Association. The tenor solo was taken by Mr. D. S. Macdonald, of the Durham choir, the duet for two trebles being sung by several choirboys. From a musical point of view the most interesting feature of the Service was the Canticles, a recently composed setting of the Cantate and Deus Misereatur by Dr. Armes, the Durham Organist, in the key of A. Both are good examples of modern Anglican church music, in perfect accordance with the "sober standard of feeling in matters of practical religion" that distinguishes the Church of England, yet not neglecting the greatly enlarged powers of expression which the modern developments of the art have placed in a composer's hands. Save in the Glorias, where spontaneity may perhaps be considered as in some measure sacrificed to scholarship, Dr. Armes writes easily and pleasantly, and his music is full of touches that show the intelligent as well as the skilled musician. There is no undue realism in the music illustrating the "trumpets and shawms," the noise of the sea, the joyfulness of the worshippers, but all these are treated with a happy suggestiveness. Regarded in a more abstract sense, the variety of treatment, the effective cadences, and the vocal part-writing are points deserving comment in a generally interesting and well-written service. Dr. Armes conducted the whole Service, and the duty of accompanying was shared between Dr. Naylor, of York Minster, and Dr. Huntley, of Newcastle Cathedral.

WOLFF MUSICAL UNION.

There is every reason to suppose that the new Institution, partially, but by no means wholly, laid down on the lines of that framed and carried on for many years with success by the late John Ella, will prove of lasting value. Mr. Johannes Wolff has displayed much enterprise in the conduct of his undertaking, and not the least interesting

Concert of his first season was that of the 11th ult., at St. James's Hall. For this the services of some wood-wind instrument players from the Paris Grand Opéra were secured, and these French artists were so greatly admired that they will in all probability be re-engaged next year. Mr. Taffanel, who was associated with Mr. Diémer, an excellent pianist, in a well-written and effective Suite in C minor for pianoforte and flute by Widor, proved himself a flautist of superlative excellence, and Messrs. Charles Turban (clarinet), Reine (horn), and Letellier (bassoon) also showed themselves artists of exceptional merit on their respective instruments. Rubinstein's Quintet in F for pianoforte and wind (Op. 55), which opened the programme, is more noteworthy for the freshness and piquancy of the themes than for their development or the general construction of the work; but these characteristics are by no means uncommon with the Russian composer and virtuoso. Some minor pianoforte pieces, Mozart's Trio in E flat for pianoforte, viola, and clarinet, and Beethoven's Serenade Trio in D (Op. 25) were included in this excellent programme, in which the efforts of Mr. Wolff and Mr. Waefelghem on the violin and the viola respectively should not pass without acknowledgment.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The Royal Academy of Music concluded its summer term by a Students' Orchestral Concert, on the 24th ult., in St. James's Hall. The programme, which admirably represented the good work being done by the Institution, contained a new "Highland" Suite in A for orchestra by Mr. Charles Macpherson, and the first movement of a Violin Concerto in A minor by Mr. Gerald Walenn. The former, which consists of a Coronach, Lullaby, and Dance, is a cleverly written and thoroughly characteristic work, and indicates its composer's possession of imaginative and expressive powers that should enable him to present many valuable tributes to his art. Criticism of Mr. Walenn's new work must be reserved until it is heard in its entirety. The Allegro moderato from it, produced on this occasion, is built upon graceful and expressive themes, but the movement would gain in all respects by their development being shortened and made more concise. The solo part, which is effectively written for the instrument, was played with great facility by the composer. Other successful soloists were Miss Llewela Davies, who gave a refined and conscientious rendering of the pianoforte part in Schumann's Concerto; Miss Margaret Moss, another exceptionally promising pianist, who was heard in the Romance and Rondo from Chopin's Concerto in E minor; and Miss May Mukle, an intelligent young violoncellist. Miss Mary Bartlett and Miss Marion Perrott are both gifted with voices that will well repay further study and training. Dr. A. C. Mackenzie conducted.

The annual distribution of prizes was made on the 25th ult., when the awards were presented to the successful competitors by the Countess of Ilchester. The Principal (Dr. A. C. Mackenzie), in his preliminary remarks, said that the recent session had been a very arduous one, but that the results compared most favourably with those of preceding years. New prizes had been placed at their disposal by Mr. Norman Salmond and Miss Agnes Zimmermann, and the fortunate holder of Messrs. Erard's Scholarship was the receiver of a centenary commemoration gold medal. In conclusion, the Principal said it would be impossible to too highly estimate the work of the professors, for it was by them and their influence upon their pupils that the high reputation of the Academy would be maintained. The following were the principal prize-winners:—The Misses M. M. Ames, G. Bevan, M. E. Bigg, I. Coates, Llewela Davies, L. Howell, V. Galbraith, E. O. Greenhill, B. S. Lucas, S. Palliser, and S. Wardell; and Messrs. R. Brophy, B. Flanders, T. M. James, H. E. Macpherson, and C. Wilson.

The competition for the Charles Lucas Medal took place on the 14th ult. The Examiners were Mr. Frederic H. Cowen, Dr. F. E. Gladstone, and Professor C. Villiers Stanford. The prize was awarded to Llewela Davies, and the examiners commended Theophil Wendt.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

Of two Concerts of chamber music given during the past month by the pupils of this Institution, the first, on the 5th ult., was particularly distinguished by the production of a Nonet in F minor for pianoforte, strings, and wind, by S. Coleridge Taylor, a pupil and scholar. It is quite unnecessary to find fault with Mr. Taylor's ambition, both because experience will soon correct that failing and because there is such striking merit in his work as furnishes an excellent excuse. The whole Nonet is most interesting, its themes are fresh and vigorous, and their treatment proves that the writer has learned to compose with freedom and to treat with skill. The Scherzo is unquestionably the most striking movement, and few would guess it to be the work of one still a student. We shall look for further work from Mr. Taylor with great interest. The other most notable features of the Concert were Schumann's Fantasiestücke for pianoforte and clarinet, most delicately played by Miss Gwendolyn Toms and Mr. George Anderson, and Beethoven's Quintet in E flat for pianoforte and wind instruments. Songs were contributed by Miss Jessie Scott and Messrs. J. A. Boyle and Emlyn Davies. The second Concert, on the afternoon of the 12th ult., was much too long—a very rare fault at the College. The performance of Brahms's Quintet in F minor, though accurate and vigorous, was a little lacking in sympathy. In Beethoven's lovely Pianoforte and Violin Sonata in C minor (Op. 30), the violinist, Miss Ruth Howell, entered far more into the spirit of the music (notably in the exquisite Adagio) than her companion, Mr. Conal Quirke. Mozart's Quartet in C suffered from its position at the end of a very long programme, and we can hardly blame the performers if it was hurried, not to say scamped. Two small solos for violoncello were well played by Miss May Fussell, and, besides all these pieces, there were songs by Misses Stone-Humphries, Grace Hobson, and Gertrude Brooks, of whom the second was most successful in a pastoral ditty, "Damon," by Max Stange.

The last Concert of the term was orchestral, and opened with an extremely finished performance of Cherubini's "Anacreon" Overture, in which the wind instruments were almost equal to the famous "College" strings. Miss Maud Bramwell distinguished herself greatly by her vigorous and intelligent playing of Brahms's enormously difficult and long Pianoforte Concerto in D minor (Op. 15), that remarkable work in which the Hamburg master first displayed his full strength and foreshadowed his future greatness as a composer of symphonies. Miss Bramwell was a little overweighted in the tremendous first movement, so full of the spirit, power, and nobility of Beethoven; but she improved greatly in the Adagio and final Rondo. Miss Marie Motto gave an expressive performance of the elaborate and richly scored opening Adagio of Max Bruch's second Violin Concerto (Op. 44), in which she displayed a good tone and style. Miss Maud Hobson essayed "Non so più," from Mozart's "Figaro"; six pupils, of whom Miss Jessie Scott and Mr. Francis Harford deserve special mention, sang the Sextet from "Don Giovanni"; and Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, played with immense spirit and abandon, brought the Concert to an exhilarating close.

The eleventh Annual Meeting of the Royal College of Music was held on the 16th ult., His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, President, in the chair. The report and balance sheet were adopted. The President then presented the Hopkinson Gold Medal for pianoforte playing to Miss Gwendolyn Toms (scholar), and certificates of proficiency to those candidates who were elected Associates of the College at the Examination last Easter. In replying to a vote of thanks proposed by Sir John Stainer and seconded by Mr. Samson Fox, the Prince of Wales took the opportunity of again thanking Mr. Fox for his generosity in giving so handsome a building, and Mr. Donaldson for the "most beautiful and unique collection which he had presented in his Museum," and expressed his regret at the absence, through illness, of Mr. George Watson, the Registrar. His Royal Highness also stated that the sum of £1,755 had been received towards the fund for furnishing the College. He also thanked Sir Augustus Harris, Mr. Irving, and Mr. D'Oyly Carte for the loan of their theatres for performances by the College students.

ASSOCIATED BOARD OF ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC AND ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

Her Royal Highness Princess Louise distributed the certificates to the successful candidates in connection with the local centre examinations of London and Croydon on the 2nd ult.

Lord Charles Bruce stated that since Her Royal Highness had been present at a similar gathering two years ago a satisfactory advance had been made. In 1892 the number of candidates examined in the London centre was—senior, 251; junior, 91; and of these 41 per cent. had passed. The figures for 1894 were 430 candidates examined, of whom 314 were seniors and 116 were juniors. Of these 50 per cent. of the seniors and 53 per cent. of the juniors had passed. It was remarkable that the percentage of those who had passed with honours in the junior grade was greater for the London district than for the whole of the provincial centres combined. He hoped that the senior students would not be discouraged by the fact that their successes had been fewer than those of the juniors, but that they would find in this circumstance an incentive to further effort. Princess Louise then presented the certificates to the successful candidates.

Dr. Mackenzie moved and Sir George Grove seconded a vote of thanks to Her Royal Highness for the kindly interest that she had shown by her presence on this occasion.

The fifth annual dinner of the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and Royal College of Music for local examinations in music took place on the 16th ult., at the Hôtel Métropole, Lord Charles Bruce in the chair. Among others present were Lord Kilmorey, Sir A. K. Rollit, M.P., Mr. Sidebotham, M.P., the Sub-Dean of the Chapels Royal, Sir A. Blomfield, Mr. E. H. Pember, Q.C., Mr. Danckwerts, Mr. Alfred Littleton, Lieutenant-Colonel Collins, Mr. A. Gilbert, R.A., Mr. Thomas Threlfall, Sir George Grove, Dr. Mackenzie, Judge Meadows White, Mr. Kuhe, Captain Henshaw Russell, and Mr. J. W. Roberts, acting secretary.

In proposing "The Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music," Sir A. K. Rollit said the position of England in the musical world was again at a very high point, and he thought that in Yorkshire and in Wales the people might claim that in choral music they stood at the head of the nations of the world. (Cheers.) We might pride ourselves upon our advance in musical education. We had in our towns admirable musical instruction, and it was no exaggeration to say that where a few years ago one person learned music in its higher forms, now-a-days fifty persons did so. Much was due to the two Institutions represented by the Associated Board. In the Royal Academy of Music they had the oldest musical teaching school of this country. (Cheers.) The Associated Board had achieved a great practical success by its examinations during the four years of its existence. Some 13,000 candidates had passed through its examinations; and in addition it had examined hundreds of schools, and it had done a very great deal for the musical advancement of this country by taking examinations into the provinces.

MUSICAL GUILD.

The last Concert of the Musical Guild's eleventh series, which was given at the Kensington Town Hall, on June 26, opened with Brahms's beautiful String Quintet in G (Op. 111). The work had been most carefully rehearsed, as a finished and impressive performance plainly showed. Mr. Arthur Bent, the leader, was also heard to much advantage in Spohr's "Scena Cantante" Concerto (No. 8), which he played with appropriate breadth of style and beauty of tone. A momentary loss of memory in the Finale did not, fortunately, disconcert this clever young artist. Mr. Algernon Ashton's spirited but somewhat charmless Scottish Dances for pianoforte duet (Op. 18) were splendidly given by Miss Edith O. Greenhill and the composer, and Schubert's String Quartet in B flat (Op. 168) wound up the season. Miss Louise M. Dale, the vocalist of the Concert, is a charming singer; but she cannot yet give expression to the wonderful depth of sentiment of such masterpieces of German song as Schumann's indescribably beautiful "Mondnacht" and "Widmung." Age and experience will no doubt supply in due course what this young and gifted artist at present lacks. We are glad to learn that another series of these very interesting and enjoyable Concerts will be given in November and December next, and we hope that the public will support the young artists of the Guild as they deserve. Few, if any, similar enterprises in England are more worthy of support and encouragement.

THE COUNTESS OF RADNOR'S CONCERT.

One of the most striking features of the present renaissance of music in this country consists in the remarkable increase of lady performers on stringed instruments and the high standard which their playing often reaches. At our music schools they not only outnumber their male colleagues, but, as we have frequently pointed out, they generally excel them in most of the qualities which go towards making a good violinist or violoncellist. The capital ladies' string band conducted by the Rev. Mr. Moberly cannot be approached by any of our male amateur orchestras, and at the Concert given in St. James's Hall, on June 29, the Countess of Radnor's ladies' orchestra of seventy-two strings demonstrated with complete success that the inferior standard of criticism generally applied to amateur performances may in their case be put aside. Their playing was indeed exceptionally good; the tone pure, full, and resonant, the technique and phrasing notable for rare finish, and the ensemble almost perfect. These qualities were well displayed in Dr. Boyce's beautiful Sonata in E minor, No. 10, to which Dr. C. H. H. Parry had cleverly added a viola part; the Minuet from Handel's "Berenice," and the favourite Dances from Mr. Edward German's music to "Henry VIII.," which latter, in the new guise of an arrangement for pianoforte and strings, exercised all their well known charm. The chief feature of the Concert was, however, the production of a new Suite for strings by Dr. C. H. H. Parry. It proved a delightful work, in which the composer has caught the spirit of eighteenth century music with rare success. Of the six movements the splendid opening Prelude is perhaps the finest. Here Dr. Parry is at his very best. All his virile strength and exhilarating spirit which carry everything before them are to be found in it. A deeply impressive Sarabande (Lento), which contains some strikingly sonorous effects worthy of Brahms, and a brilliant Gigue (Vivacissimo) are two other capital pieces, and they were played with perfect sympathy and excellent effect. Lady Radnor is a conductor of quite exceptional qualifications, who evidently exercises the indefinable influence over her players which distinguishes the conductor "born, not made." Her beat is decided and expressive, and she uses her left hand in an effective manner suggestive of a sympathetic study of Dr. Richter's methods. Her whole attention is given to the forces under her command, for she does not belong to those animate metronomes who, as someone—was it Bülow?—said, "have their head in the score instead of the score in their head." Lady Radnor, in fact, hardly ever referred to the music in front of her, even Dr. Parry's Suite being apparently conducted by heart. The chorus of some seventy voices sang two charming little pieces by César Franck, and other part-songs, with delightful freshness and finish, the clear enunciation of the text deserving special praise. Countess Valda Gleichen (a thoroughly artistic singer), Miss Esther Palliser, and Mr. Plunket Greene contributed a number of songs. We may add that this enjoyable and highly interesting Concert was given in aid of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and the Alexandra National Hospital at Woodhall Spa.

TONIC SOL-FAISTS AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

The Tonic Sol-fa Association held its annual Choral Festival at the Crystal Palace, on the 14th ult. There was a glee-party competition in the morning, at which Mr. Mellis's Choir was the most successful; and at 1 p.m.

LONDON & NEW YORK: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

there was a Concert given by 5,000 certificated junior singers, conducted by Mr. George Merritt. The Concert was not distinguished by any special features, but the programme was perhaps rather better than is usual at these great gatherings of children. The great event of the day was the first public production of a new sacred cantata, "The King's Error," the composition of Mr. Henry Coward, of Sheffield, which was performed by a choir of 3,000 adult singers, composed of choralists from the Metropolis and many provincial towns, under the conductorship of the composer. It was a bold step on the part of the Association to thus commit itself to bring forward a perfectly new and untried work by a composer comparatively unknown to the metropolitan musical world. We are bound to record that, on the whole, the experiment proved a success, for, whatever may be the ultimate judgment of the musical public, it was clear that Mr. Coward's music had aroused considerable enthusiasm on the part of the executants, and that an audience disposed to be friendly found ample satisfaction in following the performance. The book of words of "The King's Error" was compiled and partly written by Mr. W. W. Chisholm, also of Sheffield. It affords very fair scope for musical treatment, and has the advantage of unfolding a clear didactic story. It deals with the prophecies of Micaiah foretelling the fate of Ahab, and it enforces the hatefulness of war and the blessings of peace. Reflective lyrics here and there provide periods of repose from the action. Mr. Coward's treatment of the text is varied. There are serious scholastic fugues, a free use of representative themes, and occasional dramatic episodes in which the orchestra is used as the chief means of expression. The leading characteristics of Mr. Coward's music are its vigour and effort at breadth of effect. In the orchestration Mr. Coward shows considerable knowledge and experience of effect, but some details show the need of a still larger experience and more restraint. The solos were sung with great care by Madame Clara Samuell, Mr. James Gawthrop, Mr. Robert Grice, and Mr. Charles Siebert. Mr. H. W. Weston was the organist. Mr. Coward proved himself to be a thoroughly capable conductor. Some parts of the work were splendidly performed, but others suffered owing to the band not knowing the music sufficiently, or because the details of accompaniment could not be heard. The orchestra was composed of a large number of amateur performers led by the Crystal Palace band. Nearly 500 of the performers had travelled from Sheffield that morning. It was interesting to observe that many of the Sheffield choralists sang throughout without a book. The cantata was followed by the performance of a short miscellaneous programme, calling for no special remark. Mr. William Holmes's Choir gave an excellent Concert during the evening.

LONDON BOARD SCHOOL CHOIRS AT QUEEN'S HALL.

The annual Competition of selected choirs from London Board Schools was held in the Queen's Hall, on the 18th ult. Seven choirs had been selected at a series of preliminary competitions. Each choir had to sing a trio, "Oh! Skylark" (H. Smart), a piece of its own choice, and a sight test written in three parts. The singing, on the whole, was better than it was last year, the improvement being most noticeable in the expressive rendering of the music. All the choirs sang well, but those from Lyndhurst Grove (Conductor, Mr. Everett), Fleet Road, Hampstead (Conductor, Mr. J. Harris), and the Haselrigge Road (Conductor, Mr. W. T. Stuart) chiefly distinguished themselves; the first-named wresting the challenge shield from Haselrigge Road, the winners last year. The successful choir won its position mainly by showing remarkable proficiency in sight-singing, and by a beautiful performance of a trio arrangement of Stevens's well-known glee, "Blow, blow, thou wintry wind." The sight test was somewhat difficult, and would have severely taxed the skill of more experienced singers. It included one passage of semiquavers in broken time that puzzled every choir in turn. A short Concert followed, in the course of which Miss Wakefield sang two of Mr. Somervell's songs, "Thine am I, my faithful fair," and "O! were my love," with great taste and expression. Mr. Richard Stokoe (organ), Mr. Newman Stratton, and Miss Minnie Cowley also performed. Far too many speeches kept the children and the audience in suspense. The adjudicators were Mr. W. G. McNaught, Mr. L. C. Venables, and Mr. Arthur Somervell. Mr. McNaught, in announcing the award, very highly complimented the choirs and their conductors on their ability. The judges were unanimous in placing Lyndhurst Grove first. The decision seemed to secure general approval from the large audience assembled. Besides the challenge shield, prizes of books and pictures were given by Messrs. Novello and Co., Mr. J. S. Curwen, and others. Lady Jeune distributed the prizes.

THE NEW SALLE ERARD.

The famous concert-room in Paris, known as the "Salle Erard," has long been recognised as a prominent centre of musical life in the gay capital. It has now a duplicate on this side of the Channel—a pretty little room for Recital purposes having been erected on the first floor of Messrs. Erard's premises in Great Marlborough Street. The London "Salle Erard" will hold about 300 people. It is handsomely decorated; the walls, to the height of about eleven feet, consist of oak panelling, and the stained glass windows contain portraits of eminent musicians. On the afternoon of the 11th ult. Mr. Paderewski, who had come from Paris expressly for the occasion, gave an informal Recital at a Reception organised by Mr. Daniel Mayer for the inauguration of the new room. The guests were very numerous, and included the most eminent members of the art-world—music, poetry, painting, the drama, and literature being profusely represented. It goes without saying that not half the visitors were able to get within earshot of the famous pianist, but this mattered little, as the spacious suite of rooms on the same floor offered attractions which, though more material, were obviously well appreciated. The occasion was in all respects memorable—the opening of the Salle Erard must go down to history as one of the "events" of the musical season of 1894. The pieces performed by Mr. Paderewski included the "Waldstein" Sonata of Beethoven, Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses," a Mazurka, Prelude, and Nocturne by Chopin, and a Waltz by Rubinstein. It is quite superfluous to say how he played them—such an audience would have stimulated artists far less impressionable to exceptional revelations of power and skill. The applause which greeted his efforts may also with safety be left to the sympathetic reader's imagination. If future occupants of the same platform secure half as much they will have reason to plume themselves.

THE CHURCH ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

The inaugural meeting of the newly-formed Church Orchestral Society was held on the 14th ult. The Chairman, Sir John Stainer, in the course of an interesting speech, said that it seemed to him that from every point of view it would be beneficial to have a Society of this sort. Many people were anxious to have orchestral services, but at present such services could only be given at the cost of great effort and with the frequent result that, what with hurried rehearsals and musicians not up to their work, the performances were of an indifferent kind. It would be within the power of the Church Orchestral Society to remedy this by providing an orchestra of musicians already familiar with their duties. He regretted a growing tendency to consider that it was impossible for people to worship unless they were actively employed. In his opinion there was as much opportunity for worship when listening to beautiful music as when joining in it. Some little time since a proposition was made that popular hymns should be introduced in the service of the Holy Communion; and recently a Bishop of the Church of England said from the pulpit: "We must occasionally allow the choir to have an anthem, or otherwise it will be impossible to keep them together." Sir John was exceedingly sorry to hear such a low view taken of the anthem. He objected to its being spoken of and looked upon as a sort of "sop" thrown to the choir as a bribe. He supposed the Bishop thought that the object of an anthem was the glorification of the choir—an opinion which was much to be regretted. Church music should not be looked upon as ordinary music. When we offered music to God, it was not to excite criticism or discussion, for, beyond all doubt, its object was totally different. The Church Orchestral Society would be the means of providing orchestral music readily and cheaply in our churches, and he hoped that in the future they would be able to say that it had tended to raise the level of church music and added to the beauty and devotion of the services. If heartily supported, he was sure that the Society would be a success, for he felt certain that there was before it a great future.

Sir John Stainer has accepted the post of President of the Society for the ensuing year. The Secretary is the Hon. Richard Strutt, 70, Eccleston Square, to whom application should be made for membership and other particulars.

Ladies and gentlemen, bonâ fide members of the Church of England, are eligible for election as honorary or performing members.

THE MODERN MUSIC POEM.

Preceding a Concert given on the 17th ult. by Mr. Isidore de Lara, held by kind permission of Sir Joseph and Lady Mackenna, at 67, Lancaster Gate, M. Paul Milliet, editor of Le Monde Artiste, discoursed upon "The theories and errors of the modern music poem." That at least was the attractive title of his paper, which, however, dealt very little with the announced theories and errors, but chiefly with the methods of Wagner and the supposed ignorance of modern critics. In the opinion of the lecturer, any method of composition is only of service to him by whom it is invented, and those who are gifted should speak in the form that their genius dictates; composers, in fact, should avoid systems as they would fly from the plague. The musical poem, the lecturer said, had given rise to numberless theories. There was scarcely a composer or a poet but who would dictate how poetry and music should be united, but there were scarcely two who would agree. Wagner, by the power of his genius, was able to hide the weak places of his system, but it was not so with his imitators. To them Wagner's method was as much a hindrance and a snare as a giant's armour would be to a dwarf. Wagner maintained that the legend was a more suitable subject for musical treatment than the events of history; but Meyerbeer, in "Les Huguenots," had given as powerful a musical expression of the passions of Raoul, Marcel, and Valentine as Wagner had of the emotions of Wotan, Fricka, and Brünnhilde. Gluck effected a revolution in dramatic music. He said that the true function of music was to assist the poem, to strengthen the expression and the interest of the situations, and he had left the receipt which he had followed in the composition of "Alceste" and "Orfeo"—viz., preserve the truth in the declamation and the recitative, and do not hinder the action by superfluous ornamentations. But the observance of these axioms would not produce a masterpiece, because it was the man and not his method that made the greatness of a work. Methods were peculiar to the geniuses who invented them. Every artist worthy of the name evolved his own theories and systems, which were dependent on his mental peculiarities and the race from which he had sprung. Moreover, artists modified their deepest opinions according to circumstances. Of the many erroneous ideas to which the modern music poem had given birth there were none more striking than those which affected the treatment of melody. Composers strove to follow Gluck in making melody subservient to the text, and to imitate Wagner in surrounding it with harmonic complexities until reason was lost in wild fantasy. Melody, however, found a shelter from scientific complications in England. English composers preserved their sensitiveness to the simple beauty of melody. They put therein neither science nor system, but their heart. It was an old way, but there was never yet a better to stir the emotion of the listener. Why, then, was so much heard of methods of composition? Why did not the critics show that a system of procedure was but the means by which the genius showed its taste? Why did they not show the disastrous consequences which resulted from a composer fettering himself with a system foreign to his genius? Why did not critics do their duty in this matter? Because they were ignorant. Of fifty writers who arrogated to themselves the right to discuss art, there were only ten who had the aptitude and the indispensable knowledge to do so. And what was worse, every one of the fifty thought himself included in the ten.

REVIEWS.

Original Compositions for the Organ. Nos. 198—210. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The appetite for new organ music may be said to grow by what it feeds upon, and it is difficult to keep pace with the stream of new publications that reach us every month. The first of the present series is a brief Offertoire in B flat, by Edward Cutler, an earnest and accomplished art-worker, though not a professional musician. The piece is an Allegro in 6-8 measure, with an alternative section or Trio in F, somewhat more sedate in character, but still cheerful. Though not difficult, the Offertoire contains a fair amount of work for the pedals. The next two numbers consist of a Meditation in A flat and a Postlude in C minor, by E. Duncan. The first is a placid but by no means ineffective Moderato written in the Legato style throughout; and the other, though more vigorous, is equally dignified and organ-like in manner. The unexpected burst into the tonic major key eight bars before the close is very effective. Nos. 201 and 202 are pieces by Albert Renaud. The first contains a Communion and a Prière, and the second a Fantasie Pastorale. Extreme simplicity characterises the first two sketches, and if the third is a little more elaborate, and certainly very piquant and delicate, it cannot be described as difficult, or beyond the means of fairly well practised amateurs. The next issue consists of a Prelude and Fugue in D minor, by E. Silas (Op. 120), the first portion of the work being vigorous and agitated, and the second somewhat mournful and elegiac. Both movements display much musicianly feeling, though the fugue subject is not elaborately developed. No. 204 contains a Reverie and Intermezzo, by B. Luard Selby, forming one extended piece in A flat and D flat, very sentimental and savouring rather of the modern French style of organ music, but certainly not to be condemned on that account. The next six numbers contain in all a dozen pieces, by J. Rheinberger. This esteemed German composer's admirably written and extremely effective music for the organ is not yet so widely known in this country as it deserves, but it is gradually forcing its way, and the present series of twelve sketches (Op. 174) will help, for while they are well worth the attention of accomplished executants, they do not abound in unnecessary difficulties, nor are they so lengthy as to prove wearisome to ordinary listeners. They are in various styles, from grave to gay, if the latter term may be legitimately employed in connection with organ music.

Ballet d'Autrefois (Old-World Ballet). Petite Scène à deux personnages. Poëme de Georges Boyer. Musique de Benjamin Godard. [Joseph Williams.]

M. Benjamin Godard, the talented French composer, has written much, and if in some of his works there are signs of hasty workmanship, he has produced others of real merit. This Petite Scène is a genre piece containing some delightfully fresh, picturesque music; the consecutives in the pastoral section in D flat are of quaint effect. One of the personages is a young lord (tenor voice), who first compliments a dancer, and then describes the ballet which he has just seen, and in which she (the second personage) has taken part; while he describes, she mimics the principal performers in it. All that this "Scène" wants is a good singer, a clever dancer, and a refined accompanist.

Octavo Edition of Trios, &c., for Female Voices. Nos. 296—301. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

In the present instalment of a series which has evidently met a distinct want, owing to the multiplication of ladies' choirs, will be found some admirable pieces quite worth the attention of well-trained singers. The first, "Hymn to Nature," by L. Streabbog, the English version of the French words of E. Carolus being from the pen of Miss G. E. Troutbeck, is a very bright and breezy piece, with intervening soli for soprano or mezzo-soprano. The next is a setting of the familiar nursery rhyme "Dickory, Dickory, Dock," by H. W. Schartau, in tuneful 6-8 measure, the phrases being for the most part required to be sung staccato. No. 298 is a selection that should be taken up by all ladies' choirs capable of rendering it justice. This is the singularly clever and effective chorus of witches, "Whither away," from Professor Stanford's cantata "The Voyage of Maeldune." It is by no means easy, but it will repay the trouble of study. Two solo voices are required and three-part chorus. "Summer," by Hamilton Clarke, has accompaniments for castanets, triangle, and tambourine, but these are ad lib. rather than obbligato. It is one of Mr. Hamilton Clarke's happiest efforts, singularly melodious and graceful, being written in waltz rhythm. The same composer's "To the Woods" has similar accompaniments and is equally tuneful and piquant, but is more in the character of a bolero. These two compositions cannot fail to meet with favour alike from performers and audience. The last on the list for the present is Beethoven's "Noble be thy life" ("Edel sei der Mensch, hülfreich und gut"), the original words by Goethe having been skilfully translated by the Rev. J. Troutbeck. This is for six voices, and should be sung unaccompanied if possible.

Suite en Mi bémol pour Grand Orchestre. Par Sigismond Stojowski. [Stanley Lucas, Weber, Pitt and Hatzfeld.]

Suites are no longer written on the old lines—i.e., as a succession of dance movements in one and the same key. Suite now means merely a succession of movements. In the work before us we have first a Thème varié. The theme itself, of chorale character, and divided into sections of three bars, is given out by clarinet and bassoon in octaves. The variations are decidedly clever. The second movement is entitled "Intermède polonais," and is, in fact, an animated Mazurka. There is a certain waywardness about the music that gives to it the appearance of an improvisation; the middle section, meno mosso, which opens with a refined but melancholy solo for cor anglais, is highly characteristic. The third movement is a "Rêverie et Cracovienne," full of strange rhythms and striking harmonies. The work is scored for a large orchestra, including four horns, trombones, and instruments of percussion. The instrumentation is of an elaborate character, and the music, generally, polyphonic.

Arrangements for Military Band. By Dan Godfrey, jun.
Selection from "The Redemption."
Courante from A. C. Mackenzie's Music to "Ravenswood."
Polonaise from Glinka's "Life for the Czar."
Husarenritt. By F. Spindler.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The last two of these pieces are so well known that it is only necessary to call attention to their publication in the form above indicated; while Dr. Mackenzie's spirited and melodious Courante, with its delicious and wonderfully original Trio, has become so general a favourite as a pianoforte duet that its arrangement for military band cannot fail to be welcome. The selection from Gounod's Oratorio now appears for the first time, and at once commends itself by the judicious choice of its melodies and the taste shown in the ordering of their succession. "The March to Calvary" is followed by the lovely quartet and chorus "Beside the Cross remaining," the "Earthquake," the "Promise of Redemption," the superb "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," and the exquisitely tender melody "From Thy love as a Father." Mr. Godfrey's name is sufficient guarantee for the effectiveness of the scoring.

Poèmes Sylvestres. Pour Piano. Par Théodore Dubois. [Heugel et Cie.]

Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Chopin wrote sonatas, but evidently found pieces of short compass far more to their liking, and later composers have followed closely in their footsteps—we need only mention Heller, Kirchner, Brahms, and Grieg. Since Beethoven, interesting sonatas have doubtless been written, but none of an epoch-making character; it may be said generally, that fugue ended with Bach and the sonata with Beethoven. Among modern pieces for the pianoforte, these "Poèmes Sylvestres" deserve honourable mention. The music is interesting, and shows skill, feeling, and refinement. Stephen Heller has exercised his sway over the composer, who, however, is not insensible to other and later influences. And not only is the music attractive, but it is exceedingly grateful to the performer. "L'Allée solitaire," "Les myrtilles," "Les bucherons," "Le banc de mousse," "La source enchantée," and "Danse rustique" are the titles of the various numbers of the collection, and all possess points of interest.

Six Pieces for Violin and Pianoforte. By J. D. Davies. (Op. 21.) [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The first piece is a Polonaise of clearly marked character and stately rhythm. To the bright first section in G major is opposed a meno mosso in C minor opening with an expressive theme; the triplet with the augmented second gives to it a weird effect. The return to the principal key is adroitly managed. The Barcarolle (No. 2) is smooth and pleasing. The accompaniment for the pianoforte is effective, the harmonies are interesting, and the writing is grateful to the player. The coda is neat and clever. The Mazourka (No. 3), dedicated to Herr Leopold Wallner, of Brussels, is bright and attractive. No. 4, Legend, also dedicated to a Brussels celebrity, Professor Arthur de Greef, though free in form, is perfectly clear. The interesting music suggests a programme—a tale; but the composer wisely leaves the making of it to the listener. No. 5, Romance, dedicated to Mr. B. Tours, is soft and flowing. The collection concludes with a short, dainty Serenade. Violin and pianoforte players will find this set of pieces worthy of perusal; they contain drawing-room music of the very best kind.

Bacchanalian Dance. Berceuse. For Violin and Pianoforte. By Edward German. [Edwin Ashdown.]

These are two clever and attractive pieces; so far, indeed, as cleverness is concerned, that is to be expected from Mr. German. The Bacchanalian Dance opens with a characteristic theme played on the fourth string; a second and more melodious theme follows in the relative major (the piece opens in D minor). A quaint meno mosso section in the dominant minor key offers a pleasing contrast. The Dance concludes with an energetic and effective coda. The Berceuse is a dainty little piece. The principal theme is expressive and enhanced by a clever pianoforte part. The soft, soothing coda brings the piece to a satisfactory close. The music of this Berceuse betrays French influence.

In the Balmy Night. By P. Tschaikowsky.
Villanelle. By Eva Dell' Acqua.
[Stanley Lucas.]

Mr. Eugène Oudin, to whom we owe acquaintance with many of this composer's songs, has already made the first-named Serenade a favourite in our concert-rooms. It is a charming example of the Russian writer's most graceful style. The second song is provided with French as well as English words, and may be recommended to the attention of light soprano vocalists, to whom its refined and delicate character renders it specially suitable.

Give a Rouse. By A. Davidson Arnott.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The spirit of Robert Browning's lyric has been happily caught by the composer, who has provided baritone and bass voices with a cavalier song of remarkable vigour and effectiveness.

When Israel came out of Egypt. Anthem for four voices. By C. E. Miller. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This setting of the 114th Psalm commences with a vigorous chorus in E minor, in which contrapuntal devices are employed to a moderate extent, the section ending with a jubilant outburst in the tonic major. The next number is a duet for basses or baritones, "The sea saw that and fled," full of energy and containing some striking harmonic progressions. A short recitative for trebles is followed by the final chorus, "Who turned the rock to standing water," a finely developed fugue with an imposing climax.

The Flute Player's Journal. Second Series. Klänge aus Oesterreich. Fantasia for Flute and Pianoforte. By Ottomar Beckert. [Rudall, Carte and Co.]

This is a Fantasia of the good old sort: an introduction and a simple theme followed by showy variations. The latter, well written for the instrument, form excellent practice, and, if well performed, are calculated to please all who love bright, brilliant music. The pianoforte accompaniment is of the simplest possible character.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Barcelona.—M. Eugène Gigout, the French composer and Organist of Saint Augustine's, Paris, gave three Organ Recitals in June last, at which audiences numbering from 7,000 to 8,000 people overwhelmed him with applause, laurel wreaths, crowns, bouquets, and all the other paraphernalia of a "grand success."

Bayreuth.—Herr Kniese has been added to the list of conductors of this year's Festival performances, so that, with Herren Levi, Mottl, Richter, and Strauss, there will be five general conductors. The musical assistants and directors of the music on the stage and behind the scenes are Herren Armbruster (London), Humperdinck (Frankfurt), Jünger (Bayreuth), Mikorey (Berlin), Pohlig (Bayreuth), Porges (Munich), Schlosser (Bayreuth), and Siegfried Wagner. Herr Fuchs (Munich) is stage manager. The chorus consists of 110 and the orchestra of 108 performers. The leaders are Herren Rosé (Vienna) and Krasselt (Munich). Sixty dancers (male and female), under the direction of Signora Virginia Zucchi (Milan), take part in "Tannhäuser." The new scenery for "Lohengrin" has been painted by Professor Brückner of Coburg, and the costumes are after designs by Professor Flüggen of Munich. To celebrate the twentieth anniversary of the opening of the theatre, the "Ring of the Nibelung" will be performed in 1896.

Berlin.—There is some hope that Herr Felix Weingartner will, after all, retain his position as Conductor of the Royal Opera. Negotiations are at present in progress with the Munich Opera to have his contract with the latter Institution cancelled, and if these are successful Herr Weingartner will probably receive a life appointment from the Emperor William. In that case the Berliners will be entitled to hearty congratulations, for Herr Weingartner, although still a young man, has hardly a superior as a conductor and he has already done wonders with the Court orchestra. ——Frau Rosa Sucher has received the gold medal for art and science from the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar.—— Eugen d'Albert has just completed another grand opera in three acts. —— At Kroll's Etablissement the "Banda Municipale di Roma," or Municipal Band of the city of Rome, under the direction of Cav. Alessandro Vessella, has been giving a number of Concerts to very appreciative audiences. The band contains only wind instruments, and the performances are distinguished by remarkable beauty of tone, rhythmical precision, and general artistic finish. ——On June 30 two new one-act operas, "Das Hexenlied" (The witch's song), by Emil Kaiser, and "Zamora," by Adolf Stierlin, were produced at the Belle Alliance Theatre. Both works were vigorously applauded. ——Frau von Bülow, the widow of the great pianist and conductor, is engaged on editing a number of her late husband's letters. In this collection those addressed to herself, his pupil, Frau von Welz, and his friend, Fräulein Petersen, will occupy the greater portion.——Herr Felix Weingartner has just completed some music to Sophocles's "Œdipus" Trilogy. It is written for wind instruments only. The director of the Riga Town Theatre will produce the Trilogy next season with this music.

Bonn.—The recent three days' Beethoven Festival, at which the whole of the master's Symphonies were performed in chronological order, was not only a great artistic success, but also resulted in a gratifying pecuniary profit—viz., 6,747 marks, of which the committee presented 3,000 marks to the Widows and Orphans' Fund of the Cologne Theatre orchestra, which, under the direction of Professor Franz Wüllner, had interpreted the nine "Wunderwerke."

Christiania.—"Fra gamle Dage" is the title of a new Norwegian opera, recently produced here with success. The composer's name is J. Harklon.

Darmstadt.—The twelfth middle-Rhenish Musical Festival was celebrated on the 7th, 8th, and 9th ult., in the large hall on the Parade Ground, under the direction of Hof-Capellmeister Willem de Haan. Amongst the works performed were Haydn's "Creation," Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," and Brahms's "Triumphlied." The chorus numbered 925 singers and the orchestra 140 players; the principal soloists were Fräulein Elizabeth Leisinger and Charlotte Huhn, Herren Willy Birrenkoven and Johann Messchaert.

Genoa.—The first performance in Italy of the recently discovered and much discussed Greek "Hymn to Apollo" was given here recently, under the direction of Signor Lorenzo Parodi. If he used the version of MM. Reinach and Faure, which this paper presented to its readers with the Jubilee number of last June, Dr. Reimann, of Berlin, will no doubt consider Signor Parodi's name peculiarly suggestive!

Girgenti (Sicily).—The Philharmonic Society of this place recently conceived the novel idea of giving an al fresco performance of Mascagni's "Cavalleria" on the public square in the neighbouring village of Cattolica, which is said to be the identical place in which the story of the opera is supposed to have happened. The local priest protested against his church being used as "decorations" for the performance, but in vain. The best-looking amongst the inhabitants, in their smartest attire, were employed as supers; the church had to open its doors to receive the mumming "worshippers," and four thousand people from the neighbouring villages came to enjoy the new and gratuitous sensation. That it was a "great success" goes without saying.

Görlitz.—At the twelfth Silesian Musical Festival, on June 17, 18, and 19, performances were given of Handel's "Messiah," Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," a Symphony in E major by Count Hochberg, a Symphonic Poem, "Von ewiger Liebe," by L. Heidingsfeld, &c. After an address by Count Hochberg, the Festival closed with the "Hallelujah" Chorus from "The Messiah." Choir and orchestra numbered about 900 performers, and Dr. Muck conducted.

Hamburg.—Frau Klafsky has been presented by the King of Würtemberg with the gold medal for art and science.

Leipzig.—An anonymous admirer of Robert Schumann is about to erect a monument to that master, and has set aside the sum of 56,000 marks for the purpose. It will be situated in the Tauchnitz Street, and the work will be commenced almost immediately. This town already possesses another Schumann memorial, which was also erected at the expense of a Schumann enthusiast, Dr. P. Fliedler. Meanwhile, the monument to Richard Wagner, is still in nubibus. ——On June 23 Professor Carl Reinecke celebrated his seventieth birthday, when he was the recipient of numerous congratulatory messages and other similar proofs of the high esteem in which he is held. A "Carl Reinecke Fund," which was started at the instigation of a local music publisher, has resulted in a sum of 14,000 marks, the interest on which will be devoted to the relief of members of the Gewandhaus orchestra and pupils of the Conservatoire of Music who may be in need and deserving of pecuniary aid. In honour of the event the town theatre performed the master's comic opera "Der Gouverneur von Tours," which the composer himself conducted with surprising vigour and youthful elasticity.

Liège.—On June 14 M. Sylvian Dupuis conducted a Concert performance of the first and second acts of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," without cuts. M. Ernest van Dyck was the Tristan; Mdlle. Lejeune, Isolde; Madame Fik-Wéry, Brangäne, and M. Gillibert, Kurwenal. The enthusiasm of the crowded audience was tremendous.

Milan.—The great dramatic singer, Signora Bellincioni, is said to have written the libretto of an opera bearing the amazingly romantic title of "Mac's Sister." A young composer, Signor Settacioli, is to supply the music, and he will, no doubt, do his level best to introduce the necessary Scotch flavour, which is so easily imitated and becomes as easily tiresome.

Mons.—This town, which was the birthplace of the greatest Netherlandish musician, let the tercentenary of his death (June 14) pass without any appropriate musical performance; but on June 23 a post festum Festival Concert was given at the Conservatoire, when a cantata, written by M. Laroche and composed by G. M. Jan van der Eeden, was performed by 1,000 executants. Of Orlando di Lasso's own works a "Salve Regina," "Regina cœli," "Miserere," and three madrigals were sung; and Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overtures, and (strange aberration of taste!) Wagner's "Walkürenritt" were sandwiched between the vocal pieces. It had been the intention of the municipality to arrange a big international tournament of song in connection with the tercentenary, but neither French nor German choirs were willing to take part in it The refusal of these foreign choirs is said to have been due to the doubtful qualities of the test piece, "The Dream," specially composed for the occasion by M. van der Eeden, which the "Orpheonistes" of Lille, one of the first male choirs of France, had returned as "unsingable." The 40,000 francs set apart for a worthy celebration of the rare event were spent on fireworks, illuminations, and an agricultural exhibition!

Munich.—Herr Richard Strauss commenced his duties as Conductor at the Court Theatre on June 29, with a splendid performance of Wagner's "Tristan."

Paris.—The Kastner-Boursalt prize of 2,000 francs for the best work on musical literature, published during the last two years, has been divided by the Académie des Beaux-Arts between MM. Albert Soubies and Charles Malherbe, for their "Histoire de l'Opéra-Comique," and M. Julian Tiersot, for his "Rouget de l'Isle, son œuvre, sa vie," &c. Both these works made their first appearance in our contemporary, Le Ménestrel.——"Dinah," a four-act opera written by MM. Michel Carré and Paul de Choudens, and composed by M. Edmond Missa, was produced on June 22, at the Comédie Parisienne, a small theatre, where a number of enterprising artists hoped to find a new home for the lyric drama. They intended to perform a number of new works by young composers, but unfortunately the first of these is not a grand success, and the projected season came to a premature end a few days after the production of the unfortunate "Dinah." M. Missa, a young man of thirty-three, and a pupil of M. Massenet, is a clever musician, but his score is uninteresting, even vulgar, and a compound of many styles. The libretto is founded on Shakespeare's "Cymbeline."——This year's Prix de Rome has been awarded to M. Rabaud, a pupil of M. Massenet. M. Letorey, a pupil of M. Théodore Dubois, received the second prize. The test was the composition of a cantata entitled "Daphné," to a libretto by M. Charles Raffalli.—— At the Grand Opéra a new singer with a fine voice, Mdlle. Bourgeois, made her début as Brünnhilde in Wagner's "Walküre." Only six months ago this young lady is said to have been employed as a pastrycook in a provincial town. Whatever her other qualifications for the stage may be, she is certainly not deficient in pluck, to select the arduous rôle of Wotan's "Kühnes, herrliches Kind" for her first appearance.

Prague.—At the Bohemian National Theatre a new one-act opera, "Stoja," by Roskoschny, was recently produced. It is just what a refined fin de siècle public expects a well-regulated one-act opera to be: brutal music wedded to a brutal story, in which conjugal infidelity forms the plot, and the knife brings about a quick dénouement. In fact, a worthy imitation of the "Cavalleria" and the rest of what we might call the bill-poster type of opera. A new Symphony in C minor, by Karl Weiss, which was performed on the same evening, pleased greatly, and the young composer was much applauded.

Stuttgart.—The fourth musical Festival, held here on June 2, 3, and 4, was an unqualified success. The Gewerbehalle, which holds 6,000 people, was crowded to overflowing, and the enthusiasm of the audience unbounded. Anton Rubinstein, who conducted his sacred opera "Christus" (Op. 117), was the hero of the day, or, rather, of the week, as he always is whenever he appears in the capacity of conductor or performer. Opinions of the new work differ very considerably, as was to be expected, but there is no doubt that the performance was excellent. Herr von zur Mühlen was splendid in the part of Christ, the composer himself having expressed his admiration of this artist in the words: "Your interpretation of Christus was the personified ideal of my most daring expectations." That great Wagner singer, Frau Klafsky, showed her eclectic taste by singing the solo part in the Finale from Mendelssohn's "Loreley," which was performed at her special request. Magnificent renderings were given of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, Beethoven's No. 7, selections from "Parsifal," &c., Herr Hof-Capellmeister Zumpe earning the most flattering encomiums by his superb conducting.

Utrecht.—The "Maatschappy tot bevordering der Toonkunst" (Society for the encouragement of the art of music) celebrated a three days' Festival on June 8, 9, and 10, under the direction of Mynheer Richard Hol. The programmes included selections from Rubinstein's sacred opera "Moses" and the late César Franck's "Béatitudes," both works for the first time in Holland; Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," a Pianoforte Concerto by Liszt, &c. The chorus consisted of 350 singers (of which only forty-three were tenors) and the orchestra numbered about eighty performers.

Weimar.—Dr. Franz Beier, of the Cassel Court Theatre, has been appointed Conductor of the Weimar Opera in succession to Herr Richard Strauss.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The musical season in Bristol having closed, there is little of interest to record. The Concert at Clifton, on June 28, given by Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Roeckel, was noteworthy from the fact that the programme was made up exclusively of vocal and pianoforte compositions of British composers. Mrs. Robinson and Miss Moline were the vocalists, Mr. and Mrs. Roeckel the pianists, and Mr. Theo. Carrington the violinist. So successful was the Concert that it had to be repeated, and a good sum was realised for the Benevolent Institution.

On June 26 the third annual Festival in connection with the Axbridge district of the Diocesan Choral Association took place at Cheddar, the parishes represented being Axbridge, Wookey, Cheddar, Draycott, Rodney Stoke, Congresbury, and Berrow. The Rev. H. Toft, of Axbridge, was the Conductor; the Rev. H. P. Denison, of East Brent, presided at the organ; and many orchestral instruments were employed in the service. The Dean of Bristol was the preacher.

A Concert was given on June 29, at Midsomer Norton, by the Mid-Somerset Ladies' Orchestral Society, who creditably played several well chosen compositions.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

For the first time within a period of many years the second city is absolutely without a single serious event worthy of recording in a hitherto almost unbroken monthly summary of news. Not a note of music has been heard here except in the parks, where local military bands have been giving their usual summer performances. In this direction, however, may be chronicled a couple of musicaf afternoons exploited by the Sunday Society on the day of rest. The "Best" Memorial Fund is growing somewhat, but nothing is yet announced as to its probable ulterior outlook. Enquiries at the Philharmonic office have resulted in the reception of not a particle of news as to what is to be done by the premier Society during next season, and, in fact, it seems to be holiday everywhere. The Music School closed its doors for the summer recess on the 26th ult., after a successful term's work, during which the number of students has steadily increased. The Eisteddfod as usual created something of a stir among local Cambrians, but none of the big prizes have found their way to Liverpool or Birkenhead, except that for ladies' choirs, won, for the second time, by the "Gitanas" of the last-named town, conducted by Miss Maggie Evans. The Festival in the adjacent city of Chester will, towards the close of July, have proved a veritable oasis in the desert for musical people hereabouts.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

The spirit animating all connected with the management of the Royal Manchester College of Music has been well displayed during the past month. Evidently the strong metropolitan opposition to the granting of a charter of incorporation has in no wise daunted the Council, but has rather strengthened a healthy spirit of self-reliance. After a week of strict examination of all the pupils, the professors boldly challenged public approval of the result of their first year's work, and unquestionably gained it. The charming little concert-room of the College was crowded during the afternoons of the 16th, 17th, and 18th ult., and the first Manchester Festival—henceforth to be an annual and not a triennial affair—was held. The great source of delight and hopefulness was that it was entirely the result of local talent, locally developed. On the Monday the many solos of the students were relieved by the admirable performances of the stringed orchestra of the Institution, under Mr. Willy Hess. On Tuesday the choir, under Dr. Watson, undertook a like pleasurable duty of forming the framework of the programme; and the closing afternoon was entirely devoted to the exhibition of those young artists who were crowded out from the long recitals of the previous days. Without recording the names of such youthful aspirants, it must be said that abundant evidence was shown of talent, of perseverance, and of good teaching. The rendering of the works undertaken, which was almost invariably clear, intelligent, and characterised by remarkable self-possession, frequently showed the earnestness of absorbed students, and occasionally such bright promise as roused the warm encouragement of the listeners. Sir Charles Hallé and the whole staff of professors may be congratulated upon such results achieved in the first session of the Royal Manchester College.

On Saturday, the 14th ult., a Musical Fête, under the direction of Mr. Lane, was given in the Botanical Gardens with great success. It is to be hoped that the pecuniary results may help to cheer the Manchester Philharmonic Choir, and encourage it to continue the Concerts which have done so much to enliven the evenings of several past winters.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The balance sheet for the recent production of the "Yeomen of the Guard," by the North Staffordshire Amateur Operatic Society, has been published, and shows a profit of £50. The members appear to be very enthusiastic in their work and will, during the coming season, produce "Iolanthe." The Hanley Nursing Society is entitled to the benefit of the last season's performances.

The Hanley Temperance Society purpose holding a Choral and Instrumental Competition at the Victoria Hall, on September 15. The scheme embraces pianoforte solos, violin solos, and a choir contest for juveniles, with a choral contest for adults. Mendelssohn's "Thee we hail, O forest fair," is given as a test piece for the juveniles, and T. W. Stephenson's Madrigal, "O pure delight," for the adults. The conditions are most carefully arranged, and the competition deserves very hearty support from the choirs of the district. The Longton Choral Society visited Keele, on the 5th ult., for its annual excursion, and, under the direction of the Conductor (Councillor E. H. Bloor), a very enjoyable day was spent, Keele Gardens being open to the visitors. The competition promoted by the Manchester Philharmonic Society interested many of the music-lovers of this district, owing to the presence of the Hanley Vocal Union. At the contest, on the 14th ult., the local choir, under the leadership of Mr. J. Garner, succeeded in carrying off the first prize. Gaul's "Singers" was the test and Dudley Buck's "Hymn to Music" the selection piece. Nine choirs entered, and the competition was of a very high order.

The Meakin Popular Concert Committee (of the Hanley Town Council) have engaged Miss Teresa Blamey, Mr. Dan Billington, and Mr. C. W. Perkins (City Organist of Birmingham) for the first Concert, on October 8.

The North Staffordshire Tonic Sol-fa Association held its first annual pic-nic on Saturday, the 21st ult., Sandon (the seat of Lord Harrowby) being the place selected.

MUSIC IN WILTS AND HANTS.

During the great summer meeting of the National Home-Reading Union, which took place in Salisbury last month, an interesting Lecture on the Development of Music was delivered to a good audience in the County Hall, by Mrs. Brownlow, the Lecture being illustrated by vocal and instrumental selections. Mr. C. F. South, the Cathedral Organist, was prevented by illness from giving his promised Organ Recital, but the Rev. H. W. Carpenter came to the rescue, and delighted a large congregation by his performance of an interesting programme, which included compositions by Handel, Haydn, Smart, and Sterndale Bennett.

At Warminster a successful open-air Concert was given in the grounds of St. Boniface College, on the 3rd ult., when an excellent programme of vocal and instrumental music was provided by the students and a number of friends.

Mr. Edwin Nunn, the Conductor of the Wilts Oratorio Society, is making preparations for a great Musical Festival extending over three days, to take place at Devizes during the coming season. Four Concerts will be given, and the works to be performed are "The Revenge" (Stanford), "Hymn of Praise" (Mendelssohn), "My spirit was in heaviness" (Bach), "Harvest Cantata" (Weber), "Messiah" (Handel), "The Last Judgment" (Spohr), Beethoven's C minor Symphony, and Schubert's First Symphony. All lovers of music in the county will wish Mr. Nunn success in such an important undertaking.

The Test Valley Musical Society, under the conductorship of the Rev. E. H. Moberly, has resumed work, rehearsals having commenced for the Concerts to be given in October next at Salisbury and Winchester.

The newly organised Pier Concerts at Southampton have hitherto been an unqualified success, and much satisfaction is felt at the general support which the recent movement has received. Some of the best bands from the Portsmouth Garrison have appeared during the past month, and good vocal music has also figured on the programmes.

On the 12th ult. a testimonial was presented to Mr. W. Stevenson Hoyte, in recognition of his long service as Organist and Choirmaster of All Saints', Margaret Street. The testimonial consisted of a richly illuminated address and a purse of 150 guineas. The Vicar presided. Mr. Rivington made the presentation on behalf of the subscribers in graceful and eloquent terms, and Mr. Hoyte replied with much feeling, testifying to the pleasure with which he had worked with the three successive Vicars of All Saints', and acknowledging the good spirit of loyalty with which the choir had always co-operated. Mr. Hoyte afterwards gave an Organ Recital in the church. Mr. Hoyte played Fantasia in C minor (Hoyte), Caprice (Guilmant), Canon (Schumann), and Toccata and Fugue in D minor (Bach); and, with Mr. Tivadar Nachèz, as duets for violin and organ—"Elegy" (Ernst) and "Träumerei" (Schumann). The choir of All Saints' sang "Judge me, O God" (Mendelssohn), "God is a Spirit" (Bennett), and "O Gladsome Light" (Sullivan).

The reports of H.M. School Inspectors have just been issued. On the whole they bear witness to a gratifying progress in the performance of the educational time, tune, and other tests, and of the songs submitted. One inspector (Mr. Dibben) remarks: "Notwithstanding all the time and labour devoted—and in many cases very successfully—to the teaching of music in our day schools, it is to be feared that much of the good work accomplished is lost to the nation, since our school children leave at such an early age; but perhaps the admirable scheme of vocal music suggested in the new Evening Continuation Schools Code may remedy this by helping to bridge over the gulf between childhood and manhood. Such, at any rate, is the earnest hope of many who are anxious for the cultivation of musical taste in our midst." Sir John Stainer and Mr. W. G. McNaught give a very hopeful account of the state of music in the Training Colleges for schoolmasters and schoolmistresses. There are now nearly sixty colleges, in which about 4,000 students are being trained. Each student is examined separately at the end of a two years' course. The report says: "One of their most important qualifications, the teaching of voice-production, baffles all examination; it is eminently practical, and yet is so difficult in practice, although the theory would appear to be comparatively easy. For the progress students make in this branch of study we have to trust largely to their own good sense and proper appreciation of its great value. On voice-production depends very much, though not of course entirely, the art of maintaining pitch, or 'singing in tune,' as we commonly express it. Habitual loss of pitch is one of the most common and persistent faults of school singing; perhaps it can rarely if ever be eradicated, but it can be brought within the smallest limits, and even such a partial result as this can only be obtained by constant attention and skilful treatment of the children's voices." The following colleges gained the highest percentage of marks: Swansea, Lincoln, and Oxford, 97; Bangor, Bishop's Stortford, Stockwell, and Warrington, 96.

At its first public Concert, at Queen's Gate Hall, Harrington Road, on the 9th ult., the recently-formed "South Kensington Choral Society," under Mr. John W. Ivimey, gave very creditable performances of the beautiful chorus "There is joy in the presence," from Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Prodigal Son"; Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" (solo part by Mrs. Helen Trust); Gounod's Motet, "By Babylon's Wave"; a nicely harmonised part-song, "Weep no more, sad fountains," by the Conductor; and other pieces. The choir contains some capital material, the tone is fairly good, and the members sing with care and intelligence. There is, of course, room for improvement, especially as regards rhythmical precision, promptness of attack, and clear enunciation; and a tendency to "scoop," which was especially noticeable in the sopranos, should be rigorously checked. A Trio in D for pianoforte and strings, by Mr. John W. Ivimey, which was played by the composer, Mr. Joseph Ivimey (a refined and capable violinist), and Mr. Arthur Blagrove, is the work of a clever musician, who has the gifts of inventing a good theme and the power of making the best use of it, the Andante being especially deserving of praise on these grounds; it is a charming movement. The work would have made more effect if the composer-pianist had been less modest and given more prominence to the pianoforte part, which was throughout too subdued. Mr. Blagrove played Francis Thomé's sentimental Andante Religioso for violoncello with considerable beauty of tone and expression, and Mrs. Trust displayed her charming mezzo-voce in songs by Max Stange.

The programme for the Birmingham Festival is now definitely arranged. The Festival will commence on Tuesday morning, October 2, with "Elijah"; in the evening, Berlioz's "Te Deum," Brahms's Second Symphony, Mackenzie's "Britannia" Overture, and Liszt's Fourth Rhapsody. On Wednesday morning Dr. Hubert Parry's new Oratorio "King Saul," written expressly for the Festival, will be produced; and on Wednesday evening, the late Mr. Goring Thomas's posthumous cantata "The Swan and the Skylark," set to Felicia Hemans's poem, with Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture. On Thursday morning "The Messiah" will be given, and in the evening Mr. Henschel's new "Stabat Mater," Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Brahms's Rhapsody, and a couple of Overtures. On Friday morning Palestrina's "Stabat Mater" will be given, with Cherubini's Mass in D minor, the Good Friday music from "Parsifal," and Mozart's E flat Symphony; in the evening, the "Tannhäuser" Overture, Schumann's "Faust" (Part 3), and Beethoven's Choral Symphony. The principal artists engaged are Mesdames Albani and Henschel; Misses Anna Williams, Hilda Wilson, and Marie Brema; Messrs. Lloyd, McKay, Black, Oudin, Brereton, and Henschel, with Dr. Richter as Conductor. Dr. Hubert H. Parry and Mr. Henschel will direct their own works.

Miss Liza Lehmann's farewell Concert was given at St. James's Hall, on the 14th ult. The kindliest wishes for the future of this pleasing young vocalist, whom marriage is removing from the concert platform, were expressed, and regrets at her leavetaking were intensified by the perfect manner with which she gave "Oh! listen to the voice of love," Thomé's "Les Perles d'Or," "La charmante Marguerite," and (as an encore) "When love is blind." Miss Lehmann's ability as a composer was evinced in the song "Mirage," delicately rendered by Madame Marian McKenzie; by the Irish love-song, "Cean dubh deelish," sung by Madame Alice Gomez; and by a couple of pianoforte pieces played by Madame Haas. An effective "Ave Maria," for contralto solo and female chorus, with harp, violoncello, organ, and pianoforte accompaniment, by Mr. Herbert Bedford, was exceedingly well received. Miss Fanny Davies, Miss Florence Oliver, Messrs. Plunket Greene, David Bispham, and J. Robertson also appeared.

The National Temperance Fête at the Crystal Palace, on the 10th ult., included choral contests for adults and juveniles, and two Concerts of 5,000 voices each, among its leading features. As regards the competitions, in the class for choirs of from seventy to a hundred voices there was only one entry, from Cardiff, and a special certificate was given. In the juvenile contest, success was achieved by two Band of Hope Choirs from Portsmouth. In the class for choirs of from forty to sixty voices, each competing party having to sing Leslie's "How sweet the moonlight sleeps" and a piece of its own selection, victory fell to the Nottingham Tabernacle Temperance Choir (Conductor, Mr. W. Riley), a Reading contingent came second, and a party from Dowlais third. The winning choir took for its selected piece Dudley Buck's "Hymn to Music." At the Concert several sacred and secular pieces were sung with spirit and taste, under the conductorship of Mr. James A. Birch, with Mr. F. Wilson Parish at the organ. Sir B. W. Richardson, in presiding over a meeting held during the day, said there were now 150 choirs included in the National Temperance Choral Union.

The second of the three admirable Recitals announced by Miss Fillunger, Miss Emily Shinner, and Mr. Leonard Borwick took place at the Queen's Hall, on Thursday, June 28, and was devoted to Schumann, the programme including the Humoresque for pianoforte solo (Op. 20), the Phantasiestücke for pianoforte and violin (Op. 73), the Sonata in D minor for the same instruments (Op. 121), and no fewer than ten of the Lieder, including some not frequently heard. Brahms was the composer represented at the third Recital on the 12th ult. For this occasion the principal features of the programme were the Variations for pianoforte on a theme in F sharp minor by Schumann (Op. 9), the Pianoforte and Violin Sonata in D minor (Op. 108), and the Hungarian Dances (Nos. 1, 2, 4, and 15), also for pianoforte and violin. Miss Fillunger sang eight songs and was asked to repeat two of them. The artistic and educational value of these performances can scarcely be over-estimated, and another series should be given, if possible, during the winter season.

A very successful Concert was given in the small Queen's Hall, by Madame Florence Winn, on the 4th ult.

A large audience listened with appreciation to a popular, if somewhat lengthy, programme, admirably sustained by Miss Ethel Winn, Miss Marie Gould, Miss Greta Williams, Miss Florence Bethell, Madame Agnes Larkcom, the Polymnia Quartet, Mr. Roger Peck, Mr. S. Masters, and Mr. Santley. The popular baritone sang "Did'st thou but know," by Ellen Wright, and "The Vicar of Bray," and was, of course, encored in each song. Madame Winn was also encored for her excellent singing in "Voices of the Angels" (H. Lane Wilson) and Molloy's "Twenty-one." Additional attractions were found in the æola solo by Miss Edith Drake, the violin solos by Miss Kate Chaplin, and in the bright and effective comedy acting of Miss Olive Kennett and Mr. Charles Fry in the well-known scene between Helen and Modus.

Members of the aristocracy no longer hold aloof from the concert platform, and one of several Concerts this season in which titled ladies have taken an active part was that of Madame Cellini, which took place at St. James's Hall, on June 28. The Concert-giver holds a high position as a teacher, and in her programme she received able assistance, among others, from Lady Spencer Churchill, Miss Russell-Tavray, the Countess of Yarborough, Lady Margaret Hare, Lady Beatrice Hare, Lady Bootle-Wilbraham, Lady Beaumont, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Aramis, and Mr. Tivadar Nachèz. Some "Spanische Tänze," by Moszkowski, were excellently played on four pianofortes, with two executants at each instrument, and some part-songs rendered with delightful refinement by a choir of lady amateurs, conducted by Mr. T. Popplewell Royle.

Madame Adelina Patti's Concert at the Royal Albert Hall, on the 7th ult., comprised another Wagnerian morceau given by the prima donna—namely, "Elizabeth's Prayer," from "Tannhäuser." Rarely, if ever, in London has this exquisite excerpt been so well sung. Its interpretation by Madame Patti was instinct with feeling, purity, expression, and dramatic force. Mr. J. M. Coward effectively accompanied on a Mustel organ. The reception awarded the artist at the close was most enthusiastic. Vocal assistance was given by Mesdames Antoinette Sterling and Alice Gomez, Messrs. Ben Davies and Santley. Master Jean Gérardy played on the violoncello, Madame Augarde was the pianoforte soloist, and the Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir sang part-songs with a spirit and finish that proved irresistible. Mr. Ganz accompanied with his accustomed readiness.

Lady Ramsay, of Banff, appeared both as composer and as vocalist at the Concert at the Chelsea Town Hall, on the 5th ult., in aid of St. Ursula's Association for Girls' Clubs in Whitechapel. The first part consisted of a setting of D. G. Rossetti's poem "The Blessed Damozel," set to music by Lady Ramsay, who may be complimented upon producing a fresh and vigorous cantata likely to be heard of again. The tasteful choral portions were sung by a ladies' choir of about thirty voices, the solos were successfully taken by the composer, Miss Marguerite Hall, and Mr. Leland Langley; Miss Katherine Ramsay played the accompaniments on the pianoforte, and Sir John Stainer ably conducted. The work elicited close attention and was received with marked approval. Later came miscellaneous pieces sustained by Mrs. Arkwright, Herr von Dulong, and others.

Mr. Avalon Collard, the tenor of the German Reed Company, gave a successful Concert at Kensington Town Hall, on the 3rd ult. Mr. Collard sang with much taste and expression an "Ave Maria," by Luzzi, and "The Last Farewell," by Gerard F. Cobb, and joined Miss Alice Gomez in Goring Thomas's duet, "Beneath the stars." In addition to the valuable assistance of Mr. Corney Grain, whose humorous musical sketch was, needless to say, received with much laughter and applause, Mr. Collard secured the services of Miss Agnes Janson, Mr. Harrison Brockbank, and Mr. Lindsay Hammond; Miss Ross and Mrs. Hart Dyke (mandolinists), Mr. Franco Leoni, Mr. W. German Reed, Mr. Sinclair Mantell (pianoforte), Mr. Hugh Berry (Mustel organ), and Mr. Charles Fry (recitations).

The Church Sunday School Choir Festival at the Crystal Palace, on the 21st ult., included an afternoon Concert by 5,000 voices. Nares's Jubilate in E was capitally rendered by this small army, representing about 100 schools from London and the suburbs. Hayes's anthem, "The Lord descended from above," was also executed with spirit combined with some regard for light and shade. Both in the sacred and secular divisions of the programme the choir did so well that several repetitions were demanded. The hymns were sung with much devotional feeling and with point; indeed, throughout the choralists proved that they were conversant with the sentiment of the various pieces occupying their attention. The conductors were Messrs. George Hare and H. A. McLaren, and Mr. F. W. Belchamber was at the organ.

Mr. Wilhelm Ganz's Concert in the small Queen's Hall, on the 10th ult., included a number of high-class pieces, both vocal and instrumental. Solos on the violin and on the violoncello were contributed by Mr. Johannes Wolff and Mr. Hollman respectively, and the last-named was joined by the Concert-giver in a telling interpretation of Mendelssohn's Duo Sonata in B flat (Op. 45). The vacant place in the programme caused by the absence, through indisposition, of Miss Ella Russell was filled by Mr. Ganz, who volunteered the "Moonlight" Sonata. Miss Clara Butt sang "Chè faro" with her usual success, and a couple of Tschaikowsky's songs were admirably rendered by Mr. Oudin. Acceptable pieces were also forthcoming from Madame Alice Gomez, Madame Frances Saville, and Mr. Richard Green.

Mr. Andrew Black's Concert, given at St. James's Hall, on the 5th ult., was well and fashionably attended. The programme was miscellaneous and need not be criticised in detail. The gifted baritone vocalist was heard to the fullest advantage in Mr. Henschel's fine declamatory song "Jung Dieterich." Mr. Ben Davies gave two songs by Rubinstein with much effect, and among other artists of repute who took part in the entertainment were Miss Antoinette Trebelli, Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Florence Monteith, Mr. Hollman, and Mr. Delafosse, the last-named a new pianist whose Recitals are noticed in another column. Madame Sarah Bernhardt and Mr. Guitry introduced an amusing dialogue, "La Pluie et le Beau Temps."

The first anniversary of the opening of the new premises of the Metropolitan College of Music at Holloway was celebrated, on the 7th ult., by a Garden Party in the grounds attached to the College. Selections of music were played by a small orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Halfpenny; by the band of the Children's Home, under the direction of Mr. H. Edwards; and by the College Orchestra, under the direction of the principal, Mr. C. J. Dale; while vocal music was provided by a select choir of forty students of the College, who sang several part-songs, conducted by Mr. Cecil J. Sharp.

The performance of vocal compositions by Mr. Henschel, given under the direction and with the co-operation of his gifted wife, at the Queen's Hall, on Friday, the 6th ult., was pleasing and successful in every respect. The piquant "Serbisches Liederspiel" (Op. 32), for four voices with pianoforte accompaniment, were excellently rendered by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marguerite Hall, and Mr. W. Shakespeare. Six charming "Lieder im Volkston," from Op. 22, 24, and 29, and several other effective songs and duets were included in a well-arranged and not too lengthy programme.

On the whole, the past season has not been very prolific or exciting in respect of Pianoforte Recitals, but we are not disposed to complain on that ground. Certainly the flourish of trumpets which preceded the re-appearance of the Dutch pianist, Mr. Zeldenrust, produced little effect, the large Queen's Hall, on Monday, the 9th ult., presenting a melancholy array of empty benches. The player is a sound and conscientious artist, and makes no effort in the direction of new readings or sensational execution. His style is pure and perfectly legitimate, this being the most that can be said in his favour.

A most agreeable Concert of music for two pianofortes was given by the Misses Rose and Ottilie Sutro, at the Steinway Hall, on the afternoon of the 20th ult. The programme included a Concerto in C minor by Bach, and smaller pieces by Stephen Heller, Reinecke, Chopin, Rudorff, and Duvernoy. All were played with beautiful unity of technique and expression, and a "Feu Roulant," by the last-named composer, was so perfectly interpreted that it was impossible for the ear to distinguish between the two instruments. The Misses Sutro should give some more performances as early as possible next season.

The following candidates have been successful in gaining diplomas of Fellowship of the Royal College of Organists:—G. P. Allen, Swadlincote; J. E. Barkworth, Edinburgh; W. D. Boseley, Reading; G. F. Bruce, Wallington; E. Cope, Ashton-under-Lyne; P. J. Fry, London; F. J. Gostelow, Luton; Miss J. M. Hardwick, Grantham; R. Harris, Cranleigh; E. J. Hickox, London; W. H. Hickox, London; F. Pugh, Brixton; T. H. Ross, Tunbridge Wells; J. C. Schofield, Huddersfield; J. W. Scott, London. The diplomas were distributed by Mr. J. W. Sidebotham, M.P.

The adaptability and simplicity of Professor Bridge's "Musical Gestures" for teaching the rudiments of music were remarkably shown on the 13th ult., when a number of boys from the Streatham High School went through the instructive and interesting evolutions with a precision that indicated the value of the method for ordinary school boys as well as choirboys. Professor Bridge briefly explained the objects of his system, and his remarks were preceded by some excellent music, admirably interpreted by Miss Langdon, Mr. F. B. Ranalow, Mr. W. H. Reed, and Mr. H. E. Macpherson.

The Cremona Orchestral Society gave its closing Concert of the season at Shepherd's Bush, on June 28. Among the several selections of music played by the orchestra, under the able conductorship of Mr. J. Stansfeld, the performance of Haydn's Sixth Symphony deserves special mention. Miss Haroldine Nott played some violin solos, and other instrumental solos were given by Mr. Dawson Smith and Mr. Anderson. Miss C. M. Stevens and Mr. Francis Belton contributed songs, and recitations were given by Mr. Samuel Woodin.

The seventh annual Concert given by Mr. de Manby Sergison took place at St. James's Hall, on Tuesday, June 26, and was well attended. Among those who took part in a high class miscellaneous programme were the child violinist, Master Huberman, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, and Mr. Leo Stern. Mr. de Manby Sergison is distinguished as an organist, conductor, and teacher, and in the last-named capacity he was represented by several past and present vocal pupils, the most noticeable being perhaps Miss Carrington (soprano) and Miss Macquoid (contralto).

The prospectus of the Huddersfield Subscription Concerts announces a series of twelve Concerts and a Conversazione, commencing on September 25 and finishing on March 28. Orchestral music will be represented by Dr. Richter, Mr. Henschel's and Sir Charles Hallé's orchestras; Mr. Joseph Hofmann will give a Pianoforte Recital, Mr. Plunket Greene and Mr. Leonard Borwick will give a Song and Pianoforte Recital, and engagements have been concluded with Madame Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Madame Swiatlowski, and other well known artists.

The Corporation of Trinity College, London, have provided eight additional scholarships—three pianoforte, two vocal, two violin, and one for some other orchestral instrument—out of the dividends of the invested funds. These scholarships are open to all-comers of either sex or of any nationality. In addition to these eight scholarships, the Queen Victoria Composition Scholarship, in July, 1895, and the Henry Smart Organ Scholarship, in July, 1896, will be competed for, both tenable for three years.

A successful Concert was given at the School for the Indigent Blind, St. George's Circus, Southwark, on June 27. The choir of the Institution, under the able direction of Mr. Herbert Hodge, sang several popular choruses and part-songs with taste and expression, and several orchestral pieces were well played by the band, under the direction of the Bandmaster, Mr. W. H. Hall.

Miss Edith Nalborough, a refined pianist, gave a successful Concert at Brinsmead's Galleries on the 14th ult. This young artist joined Mr. R. Ortmans (violin) and Herr Gallrein (violoncello) in a skilful rendering of Beethoven's Trio in C minor, and in other pieces made a highly favourable impression. Madame Sandon's singing of Massé's "Fior d'Aliza" and Mr. R. Ortmans' playing of Svendsen's Romance and of his own "Danse Polonaise" are also entitled to special mention.

The Chester Festival, which commenced on the 25th ult.—too late, therefore, for notice in our present issue—was preceded, according to custom, by an inaugural Service in the Cathedral, on Sunday evening, the 22nd ult. A fine performance was given of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," with Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Howson, and Mr. Iver McKay as soloists, and an admirable sermon was preached by the Bishop, who pleaded eloquently for catholicity in musical taste.

Mr. Franklin Taylor has been deputed by the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music to conduct a series of examinations in music throughout Cape Colony, in response to an invitation from the University of Cape Town. This is the first extension of the operations of the Board to the Colonies and indicates an important advance in the progress of musical education.

The following gentlemen have been elected directors of the Philharmonic Society for the ensuing year: Mr. Oscar Beringer, Mr. Cummings (hon. treasurer), Mr. Charles Gardner, Mr. A. Gilbert, Mr. Randegger, and Mr. G. H. Robinson. Dr. A. C. Mackenzie was re-elected Conductor, and it was decided that seven Concerts shall be given next year at the Queen's Hall, on March 7 and 20, April 3, May 1, 16, and 30, and June 13.

"The Musical Exchange" was inaugurated by an "At Home" on the 10th ult., and the crowded attendance of visitors indicated the interest taken in the opening of a club available for musicians and others, both for social and professional purposes. A number of well-known artists took part in the programme, and the excellence of the general appointments of the building for the comfort of the members met with much appreciation.

The Music Committee of the Guildhall School of Music are to be congratulated on the appointment of Mr. Hilton Carter as Secretary to the School in the place of the late Mr. Charles P. Smith. Mr. Carter gained his experience in similar work as Secretary to the Hampstead Conservatoire, and more recently as Secretary to the London Organ School, where his energetic direction has, in a single year, largely augmented the number of students.

The tenth of the monthly series of free Organ Recitals given by Mr. Rudolph Loman, at the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, took place on the 19th ult. The programme included a Sonata (No. 3, in A minor) by A. G. Ritter, Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, and pieces by Mailly and Guilmant. The Recitals will be resumed in October.

It is intended to place a stained glass window in All Saints' Church, Scarborough, in memory of the late Rev. R. Brown Borthwick, who was for twenty-one years Vicar of that church. Contributions towards this appropriate memorial may be sent to the present Vicar, the Rev. C. H. Coryndon Baker.

Mr. Mancinelli will contribute to the Norwich Festival of 1896 a setting of "Ero e Leandro," the libretto by "Tobia Gorrio"—a nom de plume for Arrigo Boito. The libretto has already been set to music by Bottesini and by Boito himself, part of the latter setting being incorporated in "Mefistofele."

At the recent annual Examinations at the Guildhall School of Music, Miss Minnie Theobald, a young violoncello player, obtained the Gold Medal which is awarded with the Certificate of Proficiency and Associateship of the School.

Sir Arthur Sullivan is composing the incidental music to Mr. Comyns Carr's play on the subject of "King Arthur," which Mr. Henry Irving has announced for production at the Lyceum before Christmas.

OBITUARY.

We regret to announce the following deaths:—

Walter Spinney, the composer of numerous anthems, on June 21, aged forty-one, at Leamington, where he was Organist of the Parish Church.

Madame Catherine Penna, well known in London and the provinces as a clever and capable singer, on June 6.

Thomas Pettit, for many years professor at the Guildhall School of Music, on the 5th ult., aged forty-three.

Madame Sutton Shepley, contralto vocalist, on the 12th ult., at 97, Dalberg Road, Brixton, aged thirty-three, after a long illness. She was formerly well known to Yorkshire and North country audiences as Miss Sarah Riley.

The Princess Marcelline Czartoryska, one of the favourite pupils and the devoted friend of Chopin, at Cracow, aged seventy-seven. The Princess was a pianist of rare talent and a Chopin player of the very first rank; in fact, Lenz refers to her as the Polish master's best pupil and the incarnation of his pianoforte style. In the early days of the third Empire she frequently played in Paris for the benefit of the poor, and her performances were enthusiastically spoken of; her playing of the Sonata with the Funeral March especially was considered superb. She will be best remembered, however, by the fact that, with Gutman and other friends, she was present at Chopin's death, though there is no truth in the story that in his dying moments she placed herself at the pianoforte at his request and played one of the master's works.

Hermann Kleinmichel, music director, at Hamburg, on May 29, aged seventy-seven. Formerly a military conductor, and, until two years ago, director of the stage music at the theatres of Hamburg and Altona.

Frl. Ardegg, a young Court opera singer of promise, at Brunswick.

Alexander Krakauer, composer of songs and "Singspiele," at Graz, aged twenty-eight.

Hermann Manek, a favourite singer, on June 15, aged sixty-four, at Bremen, where he had been a member of the town theatre for thirty years.

Mariano Vasquez y Gomez, composer of many successful Zarzuelas, a Requiem Mass, and many other sacred works; conductor, professor at the Conservatoire, and critic, on June 17, at Madrid, aged sixty-three. He was the first to conduct Beethoven's Choral Symphony in Spain.

Filippo Coletti, formerly a great bass singer, at Anagni, aged eighty-three. He sang at the greatest opera-houses in Italy, Spain, Paris, and London; and he is also memorable as the sole performer in whom Carlyle saw any merit on his famous visit to the Opera.

Guiseppe Brunello, aged eighty-eight, at Milan, where he had been for fourteen years the impresario of the "Scala" Theatre. Under his management "Aïda" and "Lohengrin" were first performed in Milan.

Dr. Domenico Menin, at first a barrister, afterwards an excellent basso-buffo, at Vicenza.

Leopold Langevara, composer of numerous sacred works, at Vienna, aged sixty-three.

August Fricke, at Berlin, on June 27, aged sixty-five, for nearly thirty years bass singer at the Royal Opera, and one of the best artists of the German lyric stage. He was also a successful landscape painter.

Max Funger, Court pianist, at Altenburg, on June 15, aged forty-six.

Amanda Röntgen, née Maier, excellent violinist and also composer of talent; at Amsterdam, on June 15.

Katharina Luise Bott, formerly a pianist of reputation, at Cassel, aged seventy.

Carl Hieber, Royal Kammermusiker and excellent viola player, at Munich, on June 25, aged fifty-four.

Charles Philbert, French Consul-General in the Netherlands, on June 16, at Avranches, aged sixty-six. He wrote several valuable works on acoustics and organ-building.

Carl Boch, music director in the University, at Heidelberg, on the 10th ult., aged sixty-nine.

August Uschmann, the oldest musician in the Grand Duchy of Saxe-Weimar, on June 19, at Weimar, aged ninety-one. For nearly sixty years he was Cantor at Blankenhain.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In the comments on my letter in your July number, pp. 453 and 485, the writer replies to various objections that I did not make, and slurs over most of those that I did make.

Thus, for example, one of my points was that the writer asserted that the twelve signs belong to the Phrygian notation as given by Alypius, whereas Alypius gives two different Phrygian notations, and the twelve signs do not belong to both. This point has not been met. And then another of my points was that the writer assigned a note to the conjunct tetrachord of the Phrygian scale, whereas there is more than one Phrygian scale, and the conjunct tetrachord is not the same in each. That point has not been met.

In his comments on my letter the writer is good enough to suggest that I have been led away by some table, similar to that given by Gevaert, in which a scale is arranged in alphabetical order; and that I have thus come to the conclusion that there must have been a note of separate pitch for every letter of the three alphabets, with the exception of the three letters Π P Σ. I was not led away by any table. I got my result straight from Alypius, and I do not see how anybody could get any other result as regards the alphabets. The thing is too obvious to be disputed: there is not a single deviation from the alphabetical order in all the five-and-forty scales of Alypius. As for the deduction that there was a note of separate pitch for every letter, this follows from the fact that the four notes of a tetrachord are necessarily of separate pitch. Take, for example, the letters I and K, which both become D natural in the transcript. In twelve of the scales of Alypius these letters I and K both occur in the same tetrachord; so they must stand for notes of different pitch. And the same test can be applied all through the alphabets.

The writer says that to assign I and K to the same note is to do no more than to assign the names C sharp and D flat to the same sound in modern notation. That does not meet my objection at all. I said that the transcript is the best that can be made with our modern notation, but that it does not put people into a position to form a critical opinion about the merits of the piece. And I do not see how people can form a critical opinion about the merits of a piece if a transcript assigns one and the same note to C sharp and D flat, while the original makes C sharp and D flat two distinct notes in a tetrachord.

This difficulty is avoided, as I pointed out before, by supposing that we have a soft chromatic in this hymn. I thought that, in pointing this out, I had used language that was guarded enough to prevent any misunderstanding. I said that assuming that M and I denote C natural and D natural, A and K must belong to two notes in between; and that if these notes are placed symmetrically at intervals of one-third of a tone, we get precisely what Aristoxenus calls a soft chromatic. The writer does not dispute this, but he writes away as though I had denied the existence of any kind of chromatic except the soft, and fills about a column of your space with statements that have nothing to do with the case.

He admits that, if the soft chromatic tuning was used, K would be flatter than I by one-third of a tone. But then he says that K has to serve for the second highest note of the conjunct tetrachord in the chroma toniaion, the chroma hemiolion, and the enharmonic genus as well as in the soft chromatic. As regards the chroma toniaion, this is simply an assertion of his own, without a scrap of evidence to support it. Of course, if Alypius had given the conjunct tetrachord in exactly the same form in every one of his chromatic scales, the writer would have been justified in arguing that this single form must be interpreted in different ways to suit all the different forms that were actually in use. Alypius, however, uses two different forms. In nine of his chromatic scales he represents the pycnon of the conjunct tetrachord by three consecutive letters, answering to K A M in the present case; but in the other six he represents it by three letters answering to I Λ M. Now the writer's contention is that the K in K Λ M may be taken as equivalent to I. But if Alypius had regarded this as possible, he would not have needed the I Λ M form at all, and could have used the K Λ M form throughout. Assuming again that I and M denote D natural and C natural, as the transcript says, the I Λ M form would be wanted to represent the chroma toniaion, where the pycnon is altogether a tone; and K Λ M must represent one of the other tunings, where the pycnon falls short of a tone.

In defence of the transcript the writer argues thus: "At the time this hymn was written the enharmonic genus had ceased to be used; it is possible that the trained solo singers would still delight in the nuances of the chroma hemiolion and chroma malakon, but it is scarcely likely that the chorus singers would use any other than the easier and more natural chroma toniaion; and since this hymn was certainly sung by a chorus, we are perfectly justified in considering that the weight of probability points to the use of the last-mentioned variety." The writer is making two assumptions here. In the first place, he assumes that the chroma toniaion was easier and more natural than the others. No doubt it would be easier and more natural for anyone accustomed to the modern scale, with its intervals of tones and semitones; but that is no reason for supposing that it would have been easier and more natural for an ancient Greek. In the second place, he assumes that a chorus could only manage the simpler forms of music, and contrasts the chorus singers with the trained solo singers, as though the chorus singers had practically no training at all. But it is absurd to suppose that in a country like Greece, where music was a factor in everybody's education, the priests at Delphi could not get together a chorus capable of using the recognised forms of the chromatic scale.

Again, the writer argues that, if the piece was composed a long time after 279 B.C., the probabilities are all the more in favour of the view that no intervals smaller than a semitone were used, since the chromatic genus gradually disappeared and gave way to the supremacy of the diatonic. So the writer is not aware of the fact that a diatonic scale could have intervals of less than half a tone. Ptolemy, Harmonics, i. 15, gives a "medium soft" diatonic that has intervals determined by the ratio 28 to 27, and therefore as nearly as possible a third of a tone; and he says (i. 13) that this was the only diatonic used by Archytas.

Even if the writer's arguments were valid, they would only tend to show that the probabilities were in favour of the use of the chroma toniaion in this hymn. Arguments of that sort would be all very well, if we had only the words of the hymn and were wondering what the music was like. But here we have the music; and the music shows us that the chroma is not the toniaion, the K Λ M form being used in all the pycna.

In dealing with M. Reinach's transcript from Alypius, I pointed out that it must have been made on the assumption that every third letter represents a natural, two letters being consequently left in every interval between a pair of naturals. In reply to this the writer says that the modern octave, C, C sharp, D flat, &c., contains twenty-one names of notes, and every third letter represents a natural; but we only use thirteen sounds, and the presumption is that the Greeks did the same. There cannot be a presumption that, because we use this makeshift, the Greeks used it also. And there is direct evidence to the contrary. The letters α, β, γ occur in the same tetrachord in Lydian chromatics, so they must stand for notes of separate pitch. This is true of α, γ, δ in Æolian chromatics, $\delta, \varepsilon, \zeta$ in Phrygian chromatics, δ, ζ, η in Iastian chromatics, and so forth.

In another passage the writer says boldly that there never were twenty-one notes in the octave. It is quite clear that there were twenty-one signs for notes in the octave; for if we take the signs in the order adopted by Alypius, we find that in every one of his scales the sign for the key-note is the twenty-first beyond the sign for the octave. If the writer wishes to deny that the twenty-one signs represent twenty-one notes, he should adduce some evidence in support of his view. A bare assertion does not help to settle the question.

The writer informs me that, if I turn to Aristides Quintilianus, p. 23, I shall find what seems to him convincing proof of the contention of Westphal and Bellermann that Aristoxenus used equal temperament; for there I shall see a list of thirteen scales, each with its lowest note a semitone higher than the lowest note in the scale before. And the writer adds that he cannot see how this can possibly agree with a scale of twenty-one sounds to the octave. The thing is plain enough. The notation of Aristides—see p. 27—is formed from the notation of Alypius by striking out every third note all the way through, which reduces the notes in the octave from twenty-one to fourteen; and these fourteen are then reduced to twelve by striking out the 5th note of Alypius and its octaves the 26th and 47th, and his 14th note and its octaves the 35th and 56th.

This system of Aristides has nothing whatever to do with the matter in hand. In the first place, it cannot be applied to the hymn. All the fourteen signs that occur in the hymn occur in the notation of Alypius; but five of these signs are omitted in the notation of Aristides. In the second place, it cannot be applied to Aristoxenus. The notation of Aristides, p. 27, will not express any intervals of less than half a tone; but Aristoxenus, p. 21, has intervals of a third of a tone and a quarter of a tone.

The writer has gone curiously out of his way to cite Aristides, who lived about 500 years after Aristoxenus, in support of a point that can be proved from dozens of passages in the writings of Aristoxenus himself. Everybody knows that Aristoxenus based his system on something that may be described as "equal temperament"; but this was not equal temperament in the modern sense of the term. In the modern tempered scale the octave consists of twelve mean semitones; and the writer must regard the semitones as the essence of equal temperament, for he cites the scales of Aristides with their intervals of semitones as evidence that equal temperament was used, and also treats the chroma toniaion as corresponding to our equal temperament, because the pycnon is formed of two semitones. Aristoxenus, however, took the tone as his unit, and divided it into quarters and thirds as well as halves. And the tone of Aristoxenus was not the sixth part of an octave, but appreciably more. This is demonstrated by Euclid, Sectio Canonica, theorem 14.

Returning to the scales of Alypius, the writer proceeds to lecture me as follows: "Let us, as an example, apply the alphabetical test to the conjunct tetrachord of the Dorian scale in the chromatic genus. The letters given by Alypius for the pycnum of this tetrachord are N O Π. Now by Mr. Torr's method of reasoning we cannot place these letters symmetrically at intervals of a third of a tone, for the letter Ξ is omitted between N and O, and there must therefore be a note between these letters. But what note? On the alphabetical principle, the interval O Π would be half N O, owing to the omission of Ξ between N and O, and this will produce no variety of pycnum that is described by ancient writers."

So the writer imagines that, if the interval O Π is one-third of a tone while the interval N O is two-thirds, this will produce no variety of pycnon that is described by ancient writers. He will doubtless be interested to learn that it will produce the pycnon in the soft chromatic of Ptolemy—quite a different scale from the soft chromatic of Aristoxenus. Ptolemy, Harmonics, i. 15, fixes the intervals by the ratios 28 to 27, and 15 to 14.

Continuing his lecture, the writer says: "In the Iastian scale, chromatic genus, four letters are omitted between proslambanomenos and hypate hypaton. Yet we know that this interval could only be a tone in all the genera. Would Mr. Torr propose to divide this tone into five symmetrical intervals?"

Alypius gives this notation for the Iastian enharmonic scale as well as the Iastian chromatic scale. Now, Ptolemy (Harmonics, i. 15) uses intervals of a fifth of a tone in his enharmonic scale and intervals of two-fifths of a tone in his "intense" chromatic scale, fixing the intervals by the ratios 46 to 45 and 22 to 21. And I presume that, as these intervals were used, there was a notation to express them. In the present case the first letter in these Iastian scales is B and the fourth letter is C, if we follow the principle of the transcript that every third letter must represent a natural. Then if we divide the interval between the first letter and the sixth letter into five intervals of a fifth of a tone apiece, we only arrive at the result that the interval between B and C is equivalent to three-fifths of a tone.

I must apologise for the inordinate length of this letter. My only excuse is that I was unwilling to ignore any of the issues raised in your comments on my former letter.—Yours, &c.,

Cecil Torr.

ANCIENT GREEK MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I am glad that Mr. Cecil Torr, in your July issue, has revived Mr. Vincent's theory of the twenty-one Pythagorean dieses to the octave; for although I have read and re-read the original exposition thereof given some fifty years ago by its learned author, I confess that I never succeeded in properly understanding it. But now that Mr. Torr comes forward as a new advocate of this "secret doctrine" (as Mr. Vincent was pleased to call it), he will, no doubt, be able to elucidate those points which seem to me obscure.

What I want to know, first of all, is: are these twenty-one intervals fixed or moveable? If fixed, what are the exact distances between them? If moveable, according to what law do they move? Next, how many of them are contained in a Pythagorean tone? How many in a perfect fourth? And how many in a perfect fifth?

Mr. Vincent said there were three, nine, and twelve in the above intervals respectively; but, seeing that this involved an obvious discrepancy, he subsequently "hedged" by remarking that this was only true approximately. Why "approximately"? Are the twenty-one to the octavo also "approximate"? And if so, will Mr. Torr tell us what they should be exactly? And again, if there are three to a tone, why does Mr. Vincent make the lowest tones of the Ionian and Hyper-Ionian each contain five, and that of the Dorian four?

I should also like Mr. Torr to say what meaning (if any) he attributes to the following passages from Greek writers (for the sake of the printers I give the extracts in an English translation, but the references will guide Mr. Torr to the original text in Meibomius's edition):—

"These [scales] are set out according to the three genera, including the 'unisons' (συμφωνίας). And a 'unison' is when, out of two notes—which, according to the enharmonic [scale] include two intervals—one of these notes alone, in another genus, designates both the intervals combined."—(Aristides, p. 26.)

"The ancients invented also notes called 'homotones,' used indifferently instead of each other, so that there is in practice no distinction between the various 'homotones,' whichever be the note used."—(Gaudentius, p. 23.)

If Mr. Torr will answer the above queries, I have a few more to put, but, perhaps, these will be enough for the present.—Yours faithfully,

Ernest Bergholt.

HANDEL MYTHS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In The Musical Times of January, 1885, appeared an article by me with the above title. It dealt with the Church of St. Lawrence, Whitchurch, near Edgware, and with the statement engraved on a brass plate which is affixed to the organ in that church. The inscription says: "Handel was organist of this church from the year 1718 to 1721, and composed his oratorio 'Esther' on this organ." I endeavoured at some length to show that every part of that statement was a myth. In June last a correspondent of the Middlesex Courier wrote a letter to that journal in which he followed tolerably closely the line of argument given by me, and on June 22 there appeared a reply from Mr. Edward Cutler, in which he endeavoured to defend the erroneous inscription, the latter part of which can only be regarded with amusement by any skilled musician who knows what the art of musical composition is. The statement that Handel was organist of the church may be met with an absolute denial. He never was organist of Whitchurch, not even for a month. If this is questioned, let the church and parish records be searched by some influential resident of Whitchurch, when, doubtless, the name of the organist appointed at the re-opening of the church will be found and all musicians will be grateful for the information.—Yours,

William H. Cummings.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—My attention has been drawn to an illustrated article on Handel in the last issue of the Sketch, in which it is stated that the organ, formerly the property of the Duke of Chandos, is to be seen at Whitchurch. The organ referred to has stood in the Church of The Holy Trinity, Gosport, originally called Gosport Chapel, for one hundred and forty-six years. The entry in the vestry book of this church, which I have before me, for the year 1748, tells us that the organ was "opened" on May 8 in that year. The particulars are given in your Handel number, and I need not repeat them here. The Chandos monogram above the organ pipes has been preserved during all these years, as may be seen by referring to the illustration in the "Handel" number of The Musical Times, copied from a photograph, which in itself is satisfactory evidence of the genuineness of the instrument. The public will probably agree with me in thinking that it is time that the truth should be known at Whitchurch as well as outside that locality as to this; and although the Genius loci may feel outraged by such a deprivation, nevertheless the most prejudiced sentiment must give place to such evidence.

I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

William Lee,
Vicar, Holy Trinity, Gosport.

"THE MUSICAL TIMES" JUBILEE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—It is with feelings of great pleasure that we, the undersigned (musicians of the Queen City of Canada), convey to you, and the enterprising firm connected with your journal, our sincere congratulations of this your Jubilee Year. They may be somewhat late in being forwarded to you, but you may be assured that they are none the less sincere and hearty.

Although a young city in a young country, the cultivation of the art of music has not been neglected, and Toronto, in the musical world, compares favourably with cities of the same size in the old country, and as such has repeatedly been noticed and encouraged in the columns of your journal.

The Musical Times has held a high place in the esteem of our local musicians, and will, we trust, continue to do so.

May you succeed in the future as well as in the past, each succeeding year becoming more prosperous in the continuation of the good work you are doing for the art which is dear to us. Such is the wish, freely, though perhaps inadequately expressed, which we now convey to you.—We remain, yours faithfully,

F. H. Torrington.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I have the honour, by direction of my Committee, to convey to you the congratulation of the Melbourne Philharmonic Society on the attainment of your Jubilee in connection with The Musical Times.

Our Society is devoted to the performance of Oratorio music (chorus, grand organ, and orchestra), and has performed, during the past two years, the "Elijah," the "Creation," "The Messiah," "Mors et Vita" (three performances), "Gallia," "Song of Destiny," Choral Fantasia, &c. The concerts always take place in the Melbourne Town Hall, capable of seating 2,300 people.—I am, Sir, yours truly,

THE MISSING WIND PARTS, "MESSIAH."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Please allow me to state that neither Mr. Prout nor Dr. Mann discovered the missing wind parts of "The Messiah." As I have the pleasure of knowing both these gentlemen, I am sure that they would wish the actual facts of the "find" (if it be so) to be quite correct. Since my appointment to the Foundling, I have turned out and re-arranged several old cupboards, and among the parcels conveyed to my library for further investigation, and which I myself came across, was the valuable one containing the complete parts (vocal and instrumental) of "The Messiah." This I untied in Dr. Mann's presence, and at his request. My impression is that both my esteemed predecessors, Messrs. C. E. Willing and Myles Foster, knew of the parts, and that they had been carefully packed away and perhaps forgotten till I unearthed them.—Yours faithfully,

H. Davan Wetton.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Blaina, Monmouthshire.—The English Congregational Church Choir gave its eighth annual Oratorio Concert at the Public Hall, on the 9th ult., when Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" was very successfully rendered. The chorus numbered about 100, and the principal vocalists were Miss S. A. Jenkins, Miss Olive Grey, Mr. Herbert Williams, and Mr. David Hughes. The accompaniments were played by an efficient orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. W. F. Hulley, Mr. Daniel Williams rendering valuable assistance at the organ. Rev. David Williams conducted. The chorus fully sustained its high reputation, and the soloists were well received.

Chigwell.—An Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church, by Mr. Arthur George, on the 17th ult., when he played an interesting selection from Handel, Delbruck, Arcadelt, Guilmant, and Spohr. The special choir, numbering seventy-six voices, sang "Hear my prayer" and some anthems with excellent effect, under the direction of Mr. Henry Riding. Vocal solos were also contributed by Master Herbert Clinch, Master William Clark, Mr. Herbert Clinch, and Mr. E. F. Jordan.

Chipping Norton.—On the 19th ult. two Organ Recitals were given in the fine old Parish Church, by Dr. J. Warriner, Organist of St. Matthew's, Denmark Hill. The programme included Handel's Overture to "Julius Cæsar," Boyce's Overture to "The Chaplet," Hesse's Prelude and Fugue in C minor, and other interesting pieces, the performances of which were much appreciated.

Crewkerne.—Mr. Louis A. Brookes gave an Organ Recital at the Parish Church, on the 17th ult. The selection included pieces by Mendelssohn, Ouseley, Spinney, Brookes, and Wély.

Edinburgh.—On the 27th ult. Mr. Arthur Reynolds opened the new organ in St. Andrew's Free Church. The programme was drawn from the works of Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, Widor, Saint-Saëns, Piatti, and Sullivan. The organ, built by H. S. Vincent and Co., Sunderland, contains two manuals and pedal organ with twenty-two sounding-stops.

Exeter.—The eighth annual Festival of the choirs belonging to the Diocesan Choral Association was celebrated on the 3rd ult., in the Cathedral. The choirs from the Rural Deaneries of the Archdeaconry represented on this occasion were as follows: Aylesbeare, 334; Cadbury, 90; Christianity, 144; Honiton and Ottery, 219; Kenn, 169; East and West Tiverton, 100; total, 1,056. The music included Dr. Hopkins's setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis; Berthold Tours's anthem "Blessing, glory, wisdom, and thanks," and, after the sermon, the Te Deum specially set for this Festival by Mr. Ferris Tozer. These were all excellently sung, under the able and experienced conductorship of Mr. T. Roylands Smith, Choirmaster of the Association, to whom great praise is due. Previous to the service, Smart's Offertoire in D and Clausmann's Allegretto in D were played on the organ by Mr. Woods. The esteemed position and widespread support the Association has acquired is most satisfactory, for the healthy influence it must exert on local parish choirs can scarcely be over-estimated.

Farnborough.—The Empress Eugénie presided, last month, at the distribution of the prizes at the Convent of the Sacred Heart. The three principal prizes were awarded to Miss Gill, of Westport; Miss J. McCaffrie, of Blantyre; and Miss Eily McDonnell, of Tulse Hill. The music performed included choral and orchestral pieces, as well as various solos.

Froome Selwood.—The Organ Recital at the dedication Festival in the Parish Church, on June 26, was given by Mrs. F. Harold, whose programme included Grison's Offertoire in C and Batiste's Offertoire in F minor.

Headingley, Leeds.—Mr. W. E. Belcher played, on the 17th ult., an excellent selection of genuine organ music at his third Recital in St. Michael's Church. The programme included Bach's Passacaglia in C minor and Widor's Second Symphony in D.

Leeds.—Miss Katie Brigstocke gave a Pianoforte Recital, in the Philosophical Hall, on the 10th ult. The Concert-giver was heard to great advantage in works by Bach, Schumann, Chopin, Brahms, Raff, and Saint-Saëns, all of which were interpreted in a musicianlike manner. In addition to the above, Miss Brigstocke and Mr. Alfred Giessing were heard in a Duo for pianoforte and violoncello. The vocalist was Mr. Gordon Heller, who contributed songs by Scarlatti, Schubert, Wagner, Gounod, and Sullivan.

Llandudno.—An excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" was given, in place of the anthem, on June 24, in Holy Trinity Church. The solo was admirably sung by Miss Jephcott, and the chorus, numbering fifty voices, was formed of the regular and supplementary choirs of the church. The accompaniments were rendered according to the composer's score by seventeen members of Rivière's Orchestra (strings, oboe, clarinets, bassoons, horns, and drums), who also played in the Canticles (Tours in F) and the hymns. Mr. R. H. Whall, Organist of the Church, conducted.

Malvern.—Mr. Allan Paterson gave an excellent Organ Recital on the 11th ult., in the Priory Church, of which he is the Organist. The programme included Rheinberger's Pastoral Sonata, a Fugue in G by Bach, and a March in B flat by Silas.

Mildenhall, near Marlborough.—The new two-manual organ, built under the supervision of Dr. Martin, of St. Paul's Cathedral, for the Parish Church, has just been completed by Henry Jones and Sons, of South Kensington.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Miss Annette Trotman was the recipient, on the 14th ult., of a presentation from the students of the Northumberland College of Music, in recognition of the excellence of her vocal teaching during her professorship at the College, from which she has now retired.

Patronal, Carmarthen.—On St. Peter's Day special services were held at St. Peter's Church as follows: 8 a.m., Celebration of the Holy Communion; 11 a.m., Morning Prayer; 7.30 p.m., Choral Service. The service was Tours in F and the anthem was "Praise the Lord" (Goss). The last-named was sung with great precision, the quartet being excellently rendered by Miss Phillips and Messrs. Spurrell, Reeves, and Arthur, the fine fugue being interpreted with admirable steadiness. This is the first full cathedral service which has been held in St. Peter's Church since Mr. Wesley-Martin's appointment as organist, and the singing reflected great credit on all concerned. The same music was repeated on the following Sunday evening.

Reigate.—The annual Festival Service in connection with the Rural Deanery Choral Union took place at St. Mark's Church, on the 5th ult. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to a setting by Goss, and the anthem was Stainer's "Sing a song of praise." The combined choirs, numbering over 200 voices, were under the direction of Mr. Frederick G. Shinn, of Sydenham Parish Church, and Mr. Small, the Organist of St. Mark's, was the accompanist.

Sydney, N.S.W.—Madame Belle Cole's Concerts during May, in the Town Hall, have been greatly appreciated. The company included Miss Emily Spada, Mr. Philip Newbury, Mr. Charles Magrath, Miss Henriette Murkens (violinist), and Mr. J. E. Sykes (pianist). Valuable assistance was rendered by M. Wiegand at the organ.

Tewkesbury.—An interesting Organ Recital was given on the 10th ult., in the Abbey, by Mr. Allan Paterson, whose programme included Guilmant's Third Sonata, Bach's Fugue in G minor, and Rinck's Flute Concerto.

Trent.—Mr. George Fox gave an attractive Organ Recital on June 22, at Trent College. Mr. H. E. Diver was the vocalist.

Windsor.—The fiftieth anniversary of the Dedication of Holy Trinity Church was celebrated by special Jubilee Services on June 24. The combined bands of the Royal Horse Guards (Blue) and the 1st Battalion of Coldstream Guards assisted in the musical portion of the morning service, and a special hymn was sung, written for the occasion by the Rector, the Rev. A. Arthur Robins, M.A., and set to music by the Organist of the Church, Mr. H. R. Couldrey. In the evening the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to a setting by the Rev. L. Warneford, in F, and the anthem was "O come let us worship," Mendelssohn. The last-named was well rendered by the choir, the solo being expressively sung by Mr. Herbert Howard, of the Eton College Choir. Mr. Couldrey's Vesper Hymn and Final Amen were sung at the conclusion of the service.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. T. Blackith, Organist to All Souls', South Hampstead.—Mr. George W. R. Hoare, Organist and Director of Choir, St. Mark's, Regent's Park.—Mr. Frederic Just, Organist, Choirmaster, and Musicmaster to All Saints' School, Bloxham, near Banbury.—Mr. Robert W. Pringle, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mary's Church, Grassendale, Liverpool.—Mr. F. G. Sanders, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Chislehurst.—Mr. Robert F. Virgoe, Organist and Director to the Parish Church, Totteridge, Herts.—Charles H. Moody, Assistant-Organist to the Cathedral and College, Wells.

ALBUM OF TWENTY-SIX SONGS

(DEDICATED TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN)
BY SIR HERBERT OAKELEY.

Paper covers, 5s.; red cloth, 7s. 6d.

Under "Music of the Day" the Daily Telegraph says: "Sir Herbert Oakeley has collected into one volume, and Messrs. Schott and Co. have published, twenty-six songs by the Edinburgh Emeritus Professor. It appears to me, as far as I am acquainted with Sir Herbert's works of this kind, that his best things have been chosen, and admirable things they are—not always spontaneous, it may be, but in such cases making up for the defect by an excess of merit in other directions. Armed with this volume, the British amateur has no reason to shrink from a comparison of his country's lyric music with that of any other. So much strenuous and thoroughly artistic effort as these songs display should not pass without very cordial recognition, which here I give to it."

The Keynote thus summarises: "After carefully perusing the different numbers it is satisfactory to notice the equality of the work in point of merit. Albums could be mentioned which, perhaps, contain two or more good things, and the others could, without loss to any one, be laid on the shelf; but in this instance the whole twenty-six will repay both amateurs and professional musicians tenfold in the delight that sound English music, when allied to good words, always creates."

A SHORT HISTORICAL ACCOUNT

OF THE

AT

BY

C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS.

Extract from Preface.

The attention which has of late years been given by our Universities to the cultivation of music, and the endeavour to again make the degrees of Doctor and Bachelor in that faculty of substantial value, as marks of real musical erudition and culture on the part of the holder, as was formerly the case, have induced me to try and investigate the early history of these degrees which are peculiar to the English Universities, and are practically unknown abroad.

I have traced the course of the degrees from the earliest time they are mentioned to the present day, when the tendency becomes more and more marked to place music on a level in every respect with the other faculties.

RUTH

A HARVEST PASTORAL

EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy reapers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventful episode lends itself to a pathetic, picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved and sorrowful trio of women on whom the calamity of poverty and famine has fallen, as if to give intensity to their greater grief, and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal benevolence displayed by the mighty Boaz, who so quickly transforms sorrow into joy, are all introduced and aptly take their allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Citizen.

"The work, like the 'Holy City,' is full of beautiful orchestral passages, while the vocal score abounds with charming numbers."—Bucks Herald.

"'Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. . . . The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject."—Bradford Observer.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"'Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. . . . It contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

PERFORMED IN THE TOWN HALL, BIRMINGHAM, ON TWELVE OCCASIONS.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s.; ditto, paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 4s.

KING ARTHUR
A DRAMATIC CANTATA
FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA
JAMES SMIETON, M.A.
MUSIC BY
JOHN MORE SMIETON.

OLD NOTATION, 2s. 6d.; TONIC SOL-FA, 1s.
Full Score and Band Parts on hire. String Parts for sale at 16s.

The attention of Conductors is specially directed to the above Cantata, as affording an unusually interesting work for Chorus and Soloists. It takes about an hour and forty minutes to perform, and has been given with conspicuous success by the Choral Unions of Dundee, Broughty Ferry, Airdrie, Peebles, Helensburgh, and Hamilton, as well as performances by Miss Holland's Choir (2), Byfield (2), Uckfield, Wakefield, Brondesbury, Glasgow Academy Choir, Glasgow E. Choral Society, Newcastle, Montrose, Stirling, Ayr, Kineton, Arbroath, Selhurst, Chichester, Reading, &c., Choral Societies.

SCOTSMAN.
This beautiful work will enhance the reputation won for its composer by his similar composition, "Ariadne." It shows a charming gift of melody and no small musicianly skill in its merely technical qualities. It may be recommended to Choral Societies as well worthy of study.

MUSICAL TIMES (June 1, 1892).
Mr. John More Smieton's dramatic Cantata "King Arthur" was the pièce de resistance at the annual concert by the Glasgow Academy Choir on April 29. A better choice could hardly have been made, inasmuch as the work has been laid out on lines which cannot fail to prove popular amongst the numerous choral societies ever on the alert for novelty. Mr. James Smieton's admirably written libretto has, indeed, afforded opportunity for effective musical treatment, which is not only graceful and melodious, but eminently graphic in its descriptive power, the work, in short, of a craftsman who is steadily making progress amongst contemporary composers.

DUNDEE EVENING TELEGRAPH (March 30, 1892).
"King Arthur" is called by the composer a cantata, but the name hardly conveys to the mind an idea of the elaborate, lengthy, and powerful character of the work. It is rather a musical epic, and is characterised throughout by a scholarly knowledge of harmony, by a variety and richness of effect, and notably by a melodiousness throughout that are really remarkable. One notable feature which must be mentioned is the effective character of Mr. Smieton's recitatives. The beautiful hymn "There is a land" was a much relished item near the close of the cantata, which ended with a powerful chorus, in which the composer calls up all the resources before him to make a telling and impressive finish to the work.

GLASGOW HERALD (November 30, 1892).
The Eastern Choral Sociey gave a concert last night in the City Hall. The work chosen for performance was Mr. John More Smieton's "King Arthur." Mr. Smieton has set music to his brother's libretto with very happy results, and the work contains many delightful choruses and solos. Miss Annie Lea was the soprano soloist, impersonating Guinevere; Mr. Probert, the tenor (Arthur); Mr. J. W. Render took the music allotted to Merlin and Sir Bedevere. Mr. Cole's orchestra furnished an excellent accompaniment. . . . The choir consisted of about 150 voices, and Mr. George Taggart, the conductor, may be congratulated on having trained them to a high state of efficiency.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

This Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the Studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

FIFTY-TWO BOOKS, PRICE ONE SHILLING EACH.

"Mr. Franklin Taylor's splendid series of 'Progressive Studies' has advanced considerably since the earlier books were reviewed in The Times; those lately issued contain a book of Staccato Studies, two books of 'Repetition and Tremolo,' two of 'Part-playing,' and two of 'Rhythm.' The examples are chosen from numerous sources that are not, for the most part, in the ordinary repertory of the schools; and it is almost pathetic to think of the acres of Czerny's works, for example, that the able editor must have traversed in order to find good studies for the different branches of his book. His own examples are one and all excellent in design, and many of them are agreeable compositions, though all keep their practical end well in view. The choice of examples for 'Part-playing' was so wide that this of itself must have been a difficulty; the arrangements from Rink's Organ School are very suitable, and this division of the book ends with a Fugue by Mozart. No doubt the reason for not including any examples by Bach in this class was that the immortal '48' are in themselves the highest school of part-playing, and that any mere selection from them would be very little use. The books on 'Rhythm' contain many different kinds of difficulties, and here and there are studies that look quite easy at first, only revealing after a time some passage calculated to entrap the unwary student. The collection is entirely worthy of praise, and when the set of fifty-two books is completed it should be recognised as the standard work on technique."—The Times.

THE

BEING THE

BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER

WITH THE MUSIC NECESSARY FOR THE USE OF CHOIRS

TOGETHER WITH THE

CANTICLES AND PSALTER

POINTED FOR CHANTING

EDITED BY

SIR JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Oxon.
(Professor of Music in the University of Oxford)
AND
THE REV. WILLIAM RUSSELL, M.A., Mus. Bac., Oxon.
(Succentor of St. Paul's Cathedral).

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. have conferred a great boon upon the choirs and congregations of churches in which the services are choral, by publishing "The Cathedral Prayer Book." . . . One book instead of many—that is a good recommendation for the new issue, and we must compliment the editors and publishers on the manner in which they have discharged their task. With regard to the music, the Responses, Litany, and so forth, are given as sung in St. Paul's, and the contents generally in this department have been gathered from authoritative sources, and most carefully edited. The music and letterpress leave nothing to desire, while the get-up of the book is worthy of the Novello Press. We cannot conceive a more efficient aid to the Choral Service of the Church of England.

THE GUARDIAN.

The first of the two publications now before us is, on the whole, the best attempt which we have yet seen to provide on the lines of "Anglican" music a complete setting to the whole of the Prayer Book. . . . It is practically the use of St. Paul's Cathedral published in a simplified and yet complete form, and edited by the two musicians to whom the high position of the choir of St. Paul's amongst those of other cathedrals is chiefly due. The pointing of the Psalms which has been used is that of the "Cathedral Psalter," a preliminary instalment of the present work which has already appeared. Immediately after the general preface a short explanation of this pointing is given which is a model of clearness, and well worthy of study, not only as an explanation of this particular Psalter, but as a concise and practical exposition of the structure and form of the Anglican chant.

CHURCH TIMES.

"The Cathedral Prayer Book" is complete in all its parts, and neither priest nor singer need have any other copy of the Prayer Book in choir, a great advantage where choir stalls are of restricted dimensions. . . . The book as a whole is excellently printed, and prepared for the press with singular care. . . . We commend this book to the respectful attention of clergy, organists, choirmasters, and all other lovers of choral worship with the certain conviction that, whether they approve or not of various details, it cannot fail to be of material value in helping them to perform the Divine offices and to celebrate the highest Act of our worship with the solemnity which befits our approach to the Holiest.

SCOTSMAN.

The musical editing is most thoroughly done, and—what is no small matter in a book of this kind—the printing both of words and music is admirably clear and legible. The work will be welcome to choirs and choirmasters throughout the English Church.

SATURDAY REVIEW.

Clergymen and all the denizens of "quires and places where they sing" ought to be very much obliged to Sir John Stainer and Mr. Russell for bringing out this book. It does for the intoned service what "Hymns Ancient and Modern" has done for the service of song. . . . In the volume before us an attempt is made—and it seems to us a very successful attempt—to remedy the state of things thus described in the Preface: "The Music of the Versicles and Responses—Festal as well as Ferial—and a Psalter and Canticles pointed for chanting are almost indispensable for the careful and accurate rendering of a Choral Service. And yet, hitherto, it has been scarcely possible to procure these, unless in separate numbers, involving not only much additional expense, but also the disadvantage arising from the continual shifting of books during Service time, which is such a hindrance to a devout participation in Divine Worship." Any clergyman will agree in these expressions of the editors, and will look on the new volume as a boon.

JOHN BULL.

Of the convenience of a manual which provides in a compact form, and so far as is possible, all that is requisite for the choral rendering of the Church's Services, little need be said. The compilers of "The Cathedral Prayer Book" have aimed at doing for the Book of Common Prayer what was done for the Service Books of old by proper ecclesiastical authority. . . . "The Cathedral Prayer Book," compiled by the former Organist and the present Succentor of St. Paul's Cathedral, at least enjoys the prestige arising from the fact that it embodies the existing musical use of that great church—a church celebrated all over Europe for the excellence of its music. . . . On the assumption that Anglican music is that which ought to be adopted, "The Cathedral Prayer Book" is probably as near perfection as anything we are likely to see.

IRISH TIMES.

One of the principal objects of the present volume is to prevent the inconvenience arising from the constant shifting of books during the service, as well as the expense of supplying several books to each member. As, however, we have remarked before, there is even a stronger reason for recommending the work to Churches—namely, that it will encourage the general congregation to an intellectual participation in the choral portions of the service, and thus prevent that drowsy indifference which is at present too often manifested in many cases. The book is small and portable, about the same size as the present Church Hymnal, and is sold at a price marvellously small, considering its character. . . . The work has evidently received all that care and thought in its compilation which it is in the power of two such well-known and distinguished musicians as the Professor of Music of Oxford University and the Succentor of St. Paul's Cathedral to bestow, and we would recommend it very strongly to the notice of our clergy, choirmasters, and organists.

MISS
FANNY DE BOUFFLERS
(SOPRANO)
For Oratorios, Cantatas, Concerts, Operatic Recitals, &c.

"The Scottish Orchestra" (Mr. Georg Henschel, Conductor).—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers contributed much to the enjoyment of the audience. She refused an encore (thrice recalled) for a rendering of the Handelian Air 'Let the bright Seraphim,' but on again being enthusiastically recalled after singing "Should he upbraid," repeated a portion of it."—Glasgow Mail.

"Miss Fanny de Boufflers sang 'Should he upbraid' with a piquancy and brightness which suited the number admirably. The audience was thoroughly pleased, and insisted on a repetition, to which the artist was finally persuaded."—Glasgow Herald.

Cherubini's "O fons amoris."—"A most excellent rendering was given of Cherubini's 'O fons amoris.' The very exacting solo (ranging from C to C in Alt) was splendidly executed by Miss Fanny de Boufflers, whose extensive range and fine method were therein displayed to the greatest advantage. The work is one of the composer's six greater Motets. The intrinsic difficulty of the solo soprano, requiring the extraordinary range of two whole octaves, renders the performance of the work a great rarity."—Liverpool Daily Post.

Rossini's "Stabat Mater."—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers' interpretation of the 'Inflammatus' was at once prayerful and most artistic, and well worthy of her high reputation as an exponent of sacred music."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Elijah" (Cambrian Choral Society).—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers sang the heavy work which is allotted to the soprano with sympathy, fervour, and dramatic fire throughout."—Birkenhead Advertiser.

City Hall Concert, Glasgow.—"Signor Foli and party attracted an immense audience. . . . Signor Foli sang the duet with Miss Fanny de Boufflers, 'La Dove Prende' (Mozart). Miss de Boufflers appeared once before this season at these concerts, and her performances on Saturday night more than confirmed, they greatly increased the highly favourable impression she made on the former occasion. The selections she gave were admirably fitted to show the rich, full and flexible quality of her voice."—North British Daily Mail.

"A soprano of very considerable worth, receiving a most emphatic demonstration of appreciation from her hearers."—Glasgow Herald.

"Powerful and clear soprano voice."—Northern Daily Telegraph.

"Whose vocalisation was artistic and refined."—Western Daily Press, Bristol.

"Powerful soprano, . . . considerable natural talent."—Manchester Guardian.

"Possesses a bright, pure soprano voice."—Walsall Observer.

"An artist of decided abilities."—Waterford Star.

"Remarkably sweet and powerful soprano."—Cork Herald.

"Has a well-trained, pure and beautiful voice."—Harrogate Advertiser.

"Was a great success, . . . received with unbounded applause."—Dublin Evening Telegraph.

Extract from the Liverpool Daily Post, June 4, 1894.—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers is in growing demand as leading vocalist at our popular watering-places and health resorts. Having just fulfilled an engagement at Llandudno, our Liverpool prima donna is now at Rhyl, where she remains for a week, next visiting in turn Blackpool, Buxton, Douglas, Lytham, Harrogate, Scarborough, &c., and some return visits, including a special engagement during the week of the royal visit to Rhyl; in all over eleven weeks' engagement."

"A Booklet" of Press Opinions, Répertoire, Photo, Terms, &c., forwarded on application. Address, Carlton House, Saint James Road, Liverpool.

(CONTRALTO)
(Pupil of Signor Randegger)
For Oratorios, Cantatas, Concerts, &c.

Brief Extracts.

Sir Chas. Hallé's Grand Concerts.—"Miss Alice Walker sang the contralto music in the 'Walpurgis Night" with excellent taste."—Manchester Guardian, Feb. 13, 1891.

"Miss Alice Walker is always listened to with pleasure. In the Recitative and Air, 'I dreamt I was in heaven' (Costa), she was more than successful."—Manchester Courier.

"In her first song, 'Nobil Signor,' from 'Les Huguenots,' Miss Alice Walker displayed a full and resonant contralto voice of good quality. Her delivery of this difficult cavatina was highly artistic."—London, May 11, 1892.

"Each time we hear her we recognise an advance in her art. Her reading of Meyerbeer's cavatina 'Nobil Signor' is excellent, and, in a different fashion, nothing could be pleasanter than her singing of the 'Slumber Song' by Heinz."—Manchester, Dec. 4, 1893.

"The air 'Thou shalt bring them in,' from 'Israel in Egypt,' by Miss Walker, was particularly well received, the applause amounting to a re-call."—Kendal, March 13, 1893.

"Especially pleasing was Miss Walker's singing of the beautiful air 'O rest in the Lord' ('Elijah'), the expression being excellent."—Buxton, July 21, 1894.

(The Australian popular Baritone)

Having returned to England after a long and successful career, is now booking Engagements for Miscellaneous and Oratorio Concerts.

"Mr. Tom Burgin, who sang Ciro Pinsuti's 'I fear no foe,' is one of the finest baritones ever heard in this city. His voice is full and perfectly under command, and the way in which he rang out the defiant tones of his song last night was something to be remembered."—Melbourne Argus.

"In the soul-stirring song, 'The Bay of Biscay,' he was most vociferously encored, and, in spite of two recalls, he was compelled to repeat the last verse, which gave unlimited satisfaction to the audience."—Sydney Morning Herald.

"Mr. T. Burgin has in his voice and manner the conditions of success, and only needs to be known to be appreciated in this wider artistically, but, geographically narrower, tight little island. His songs were well chosen to display his varied powers, his first appearance being made in an Australian song, 'Imperfectus,' by Sir W. C. F. Robinson, Governor of Western Australia. This proved a most interesting composition and was enthusiastically received."—Northern Echo.

"In Mr. T. Burgin Mons. Speelman has found a really splendid baritone, and Mons. Speelman was so delighted with Mr. Burgin's singing that he shook hands with him on the stage in a complimentary manner. Mr. Burgin has met with all the success he merited, and his next appearance will be anxiously awaited for."—Blackpool Times.

Terms, &c., apply, 181, Wilmslow Road, Rusholme, Manchester.

(Principal Bass, Leeds Parish Church Choir).

"ELIJAH."—"Mr. Browning scored a distinct triumph in the very trying work allotted to the baritone. . . . He certainly proved himself to be one of the best representatives of Elijah Sheffield has heard."—Sheffield Independent, April 15, 1893.

"MARITANA."—"Mr. Browning doubled the parts of Don Jose and The King, and his singing was very effective, because it was tuneful, sympathetic, and well phrased. He was encored for a very expressive delivery of the ballad 'In happy moments,' and for an exceptionally fine rendering of 'This heart by woe o'ertaken,' and for the latter repeated a part of the pendant, 'No! my courage!'"—Huddersfield Examiner, October 28, 1893.

"JUDAS."—"Mr. Browning left no doubtful impression. Throughout he sang with very fine effect. 'Arm, arm, ye brave' was greatly applauded, and would have been encored had not the following chorus, 'We come,' put an end to the chance of getting Mr. Browning back. As it was, a good number of bars of the chorus were passed before the applause ceased. . . . Mr. Browning had a well-deserved encore for 'The Lord worketh wonders.' In these days when runs like those of Handel's day are long out of fashion, save for voice-training, they are apt to be deemed insipid. But so long as they fall into the hands of artists like Mr. Browning, Handel's airs will live not only in spite of their roccoco embellishments, but because of them, and the splendid opportunities they afford to exhibit the highest effects of careful culture and study. The management of breathing is one of the first troubles they exhibit; but Mr. Browning sang in this respect without any effort, and with the utmost smoothness and precision, yet con bravura, and with great power."—Whitehaven Free Press, December 23, 1893.

"BRIDE OF DUNKERRON."—"The appearance of The Sea King was at once made manifest by Mr. Browning in his magnificent singing of the Recitative and Air, 'Wherefore are ye calling' and 'The Sea rules all.' By his rendering of this piece Mr. Browning at once made himself the favourite of the evening, especially so by the vigour and, at the same time, the ease with which he executed the parts allotted to him. His voice is full of power, and he uses its fine range with the best effect."—Elland Echo, March 2, 1894.

"CREATION."—"Mr. Browning was thoroughly successful in the bass solos. In the Recit. at the outset, 'In the beginning,' he showed himself to be in fine condition for his share of the work; and in 'Rolling in foaming billows' he sang with dramatic skill, the band assisting his efforts in effective fashion, the pastoral-like 'Softly purling,' which closes the movement, being treated with much devotional feeling, and was warmly recognised."—Rotherham Advertiser, March 31, 1894.

"The purity of his voice and his perfect enunciation make his singing thoroughly popular."—Bradford Observer, December 11, 1893.

"Last, but by no means least, comes Mr. John Browning, the talented and gifted bass, who may be termed as having been the 'star' of the evening. Mendelssohn's 'I'm a roamer' was heard to perfection, and so well received that he had to give an encore, 'In sheltered vale.' He also responded with an encore after both his other songs."—Jarrow Guardian, December 16, 1893.

"Mr. John Browning as the bass vocalist took immensely, his songs being especially rendered with polished and artistic taste, combined with perfect enunciation."—Halifax Guardian, February 17, 1894.

"THE CREATION," DEVIZES.—"Master Gough proved himself to be possessed of a voice which for flute-like beauty can belong but to few in a century. Indeed, we should doubt if there are in England a dozen such voices as his; and the splendid way in which he sang the florid passages evinced a training which is also rare."—Wiltshire Telegraph, June 2, 1894.

PRESS NOTICE.—"A word must be added in praise of the little choir boy, who sang the part of the first child in Dr. Parry's 'Judith.' So much beauty of voice and charm of expression is rarely found in one so young. The youth to whom I particularly refer is Master Sterndale Bennett—with the boy's relationship, if any, to W. Sterndale Bennett I am wholly unacquainted; but judging by the work he did he is not unfitted to bear the distinguished name, and not unqualified, perhaps, to shed fresh lustre upon it in years to come."—Daily Telegraph, August 27 and 28.

"'The Westminster Singers' gave a beautiful rendering of 'The Dance,' and being loudly re-demanded complied with a humorous rendering of 'The Letter.' The part-song 'Departure' was indeed a treat. 'The Vacant Chair' was given with charming effect. The plantation melody, 'Yo, yah, yo,' was greeted with a loud encore."—Montgomery County Times.

AMERICAN COPYRIGHT.

Novello and Co. v. The Oliver Ditson Co.—Judgment.

The hopes and expectations of British composers and music publishers, so far as they were founded on the anticipation of benefits to be derived from the American Copyright Act of 1891, have been subjected to three distinct shocks since that Act became law on March 3 in that year. Each of these shocks has amounted to a veritable crisis, which threatened at one time to imperil the very existence of the International character of the Act in its application to Great Britain, and afterwards to discount the practical benefits which it was intended to bestow, by converting it into a sort of trap for those who were bold enough to attach a plain meaning to plain words. The last of these crises was successfully passed on the 1st ult., when Judge Colt, in the action of "Littleton and others (Novello and Co.) v. The Oliver Ditson Co.," delivered the judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States in favour of the Plaintiffs, and granted them the injunction they sought.

For the purpose of making the actual point thus recently decided more clear to those who have not had the opportunity of following the details of this Act from its origin, it is necessary to give a short résumé of its history, with special reference to those sections which have raised this important controversy, and which provoked the several crises referred to.

The following sections of the Act alone need careful examination:—

Sect. 1.—The author, inventor, designer, or proprietor of any book, map, chart, dramatic or musical composition, engraving, cut, print, or photograph or negative thereof, or of a painting, drawing, chromo, statue, statuary, and of models or designs intended to be perfected as works of the fine arts, and the executors, administrators, or assigns of any such person shall, upon complying with the provisions of this chapter, have the sole liberty of printing, reprinting, publishing, completing, copying, executing, finishing, and vending the same.

Sect. 3.—No person shall be entitled to a copyright unless he shall [within certain fixed limitations of time, deposit at the American Copyright Office a printed copy of the title and two copies of the work to be copyrighted].

Then follows the important proviso, commonly known as the "Manufacturing Clause," which has proved the real bone of contention in the recent litigation:—

Provided, that in the case of a book, photograph, chromo, or lithograph, the two copies of the same required to be delivered or deposited as above shall be printed from type set within the limits of the United States, or from plates made therefrom, or from negatives, or drawings on stone made within the limits of the United States, or from transfers made therefrom. During the existence of such copyright the importation into the United States of any book, chromo or lithograph, or photograph, so copyrighted, or any edition or editions thereof, or any plates of the same not made from type set, negatives, or drawings on stone made within the limits of the United States, shall be, and it is hereby, prohibited.

The point for decision in the action "Novello and Co. v. The Oliver Ditson Co." was—whether a "Musical Composition," referred to as a subject of copyright in Section 1, is "a book" within the meaning of the proviso in Section 3, and, therefore, whether copyright can be secured in America for a musical composition which has not been printed from type set in America.

The last section of the Act which originated the first of the three crises above referred to runs as follows:—

Sect. 13.—That this Act shall only apply to a citizen or subject of a foreign state or nation when such foreign state or nation permits to citizens of the United States of America the benefit of copyright on substantially the same basis as its own citizens; or when such foreign state or nation is a party to an international agreement which provides for reciprocity in the granting of copyright, by the terms of which agreement the United States of America may, at its pleasure, become a party to such agreement. The existence of either of the conditions aforesaid shall be determined by the President of the United States by proclamation made from time to time as the purposes of this Act may require.

It will be noted that the benefits of the American Act are reserved to the subjects of those countries alone which the President of the United States might proclaim under the Act, and that the President could not proclaim a country which did not permit to Americans the benefits of copyright on substantially the same basis as to its own citizens. When once a country was proclaimed, the new American law abandoned absolutely, as regards that country, its former objection to aliens holding copyright, nor was it any longer necessary that the foreigner seeking copyright should reside in America. On the other hand, there was a doubt, or a supposed doubt, whether the English law permits aliens to hold copyright in Great Britain, and further, whether residence in some part of Her Majesty's Dominions is not a necessary condition to British copyright. These apprehensions evidently weighed heavily upon the mind of the American President; for, had they been well founded, it was felt that on the two points in question there would be a want of reciprocity on the part of Great Britain; and the President hesitated to proclaim Great Britain as one of the countries which were to be entitled to the benefit of the American Act. Things therefore assumed a somewhat critical aspect at the outset. The points were at once referred to Lord Salisbury by the American Ambassador in London, and the law officers of the Crown were in due course consulted by the English Government. From them a very precise opinion was obtained, that an alien can hold British Copyright by first publishing in any part of Her Majesty's Dominions; that contemporaneous publication in another country does not defeat British Copyright; that residence in some part of Her Majesty's Dominions is not essential for the acquisition of British Copyright, and that the Copyright law in all British Dominions permits Americans to enjoy the benefit of copyright on the same footing as it permits British subjects. This statement of the existing British law at once satisfied the American President; the British Dominions were duly proclaimed by the President as entitled to the benefits of the Act of 1891, and the first crisis was at an end. From what had transpired up to this point it is evident that there is no International Copyright Treaty between England and America as is generally, but erroneously, supposed. America, uncontrolled by any other country, merely altered her own domestic law in such a way as to admit to its full benefit aliens who had been previously excluded, and the statement of the British law by the British Government was merely an answer to a question, addressed to the Government from America, upon which the President of the United States was free to act as to him seemed best. The cause for wonder is that America, having gone so far in the direction of recognising the principle of the International view of copyright, did not go one step farther and join the Berne Convention of 1886, which established International Copyright amongst the principal nations of Europe.

The second crisis followed very quickly upon the first; for, some time before the American Act came into active force (on July 1, 1891), Mr. Lauriston L. Scaife, Messrs. Novello and Co.'s American counsel, who had long ago established his reputation as an authority on Copyright law, advised them that long before the American Courts could have an opportunity of deciding the doubtful point under the Manufacturing Clause, which might hold a musical composition to be "a book" and require it to be printed in America, vast quantities of musical compositions would be offered for entry as copyright at the American Copyright Office; and that British composers and their publishers, relying on their contention that the American Act does not require musical compositions to be printed in America, would offer for entry as copyright quantities of publications printed in England, and would ship those publications to America either by post or through the American Customs House. It was clear, therefore, that the first interpretation of the doubtful point would rest, from the very day on which the law came into operation, with the Librarian of Congress (the Copyright Officer), who might decline to make entry of English printed musical publications in his office, and with the Customs officials and Postal officials, who (under the Importation Clause following the proviso) might decline to admit those publications into the country seeing that they had not been printed there. Under these circumstances there was a very reasonable possibility that, for some considerable time before a legal decision could be obtained, the non-judicial authorities referred to would prejudge the whole question to the disadvantage of British copyright holders, and would refuse to acknowledge that copyright could exist in English-printed music, until, at some later date, an American Court should decide that the Manufacturing Clause did not apply to music. To meet this very serious possibility, Messrs. Novello and Co.'s counsel saw the necessity of ascertaining forthwith what view these State officials proposed to take in the matter, and of convincing them that there was only one reasonable view that they could take. For this purpose Mr. Scaife, at a great expenditure of time and labour, involving a very deep research into the law of the case, and a prolonged examination of the State records, went to work, on Messrs. Novello's behalf, to interview all the important State officials who, in their administrative capacity, would be called upon forthwith to interpret the Act. Not only did he hold long discussions with Mr. Spofford, the Librarian of Congress and head of the Copyright Office, with the Customs officials and others, but he obtained access to important official reports, and was successful in securing interviews with some of the most influential members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate who had taken active parts in the passage of the Bill through the Houses of the Legislature; and from these sources, besides obtaining encouragement in other ways, he ascertained that not only was it intended to exclude "musical compositions" from the Manufacturing Clause, but that an Amendment by which an attempt was made to include "musical compositions" had been debated upon and rejected. Mr. Scaife then prepared a very learned and elaborate treatise upon the whole question, copies of which he furnished to Mr. Spofford and others interested, wherein he urged, in support of the English view of the meaning of the Act, nearly every one of the many points which he subsequently very skilfully elaborated in his "brief" (printed argument) in the law-suit which followed. At that time the Act had not yet come into operation, but July 1 was approaching, and it was still a matter of anxious doubt as to what view the administrative officials would adopt. Mr. Scaife's treatise, however, seems to have surprised many of these officials and to have convinced them all. It carried everything before it. Before a writ was issued he had obtained all the benefits of an interim judgment, and the American State officials, so far as they could decide the point, decided that until the courts might overrule them, the practice of their several departments must be in favour of the copyrighting and importation of musical publications, even though printed in England or in any other proclaimed country.

The second crisis was now over. Messrs. Novello's counsel had, without going into court, obtained a primâ facie copyright for English-printed music, and he thereby established a practice which for three years had all the effect of law. This interpretation of the law was of the utmost importance to those who supported the English view of the meaning of the Manufacturing Clause, for the onus was thereby laid on the attacking parties, not only of proving that the law had been wrongly administered, but also of facing the formidable task of upsetting the established practice of the administrative Government departments. The English position, therefore, became a strong one; for should the law courts ultimately have considered that the meaning of the Act was doubtful, they would, in accordance with their own decisions, have leaned towards the assumption that the settled practice, unless it was clearly wrong, was right, and that, for the sake of convenience, it ought not to be disturbed. If there had been a doubt the English view would probably have had the benefit of it.

The American music publishers and printers, however, were not content to let the matter rest here; they determined to have a legal decision on the point. Very soon after the Act came into force the defendants, The Oliver Ditson Co., reprinted three or four of the plaintiffs' publications, which the American Copyright Officer had admitted as copyright in his office. These publications had all been printed in England, and everything was ripe for litigation. Hitherto Messrs. Novello and Co. alone had borne the brunt of the battle, but at this point all the important music publishers in London came to their assistance, and, under the auspices of the London Music Publishers' Association, guaranteed a fund to provide the necessary expenses for commencing and prosecuting an action. Pressure was also brought to bear upon German and French music publishers in the hope that they also would join in the fight by contributing to the expenses of the litigation; but the foreigners, notwithstanding that their interests were identical with those of the Plaintiffs in the action, preferred to look on while England fought for the benefit of all, and no help was obtained from the Continent. Mr. Scaife, who already had his material and arguments at his fingers' ends, was promptly instructed by Messrs. Novello to issue a writ against the defendants in the action asking for an injunction to restrain them from printing, publishing, or selling the English copyrights which had been infringed. The writ was duly issued and the third crisis in the matter had to be faced. The first steps in the action were taken just two years ago, and the case was ultimately argued as a pure question of law, all the facts being admitted. The substance of the judgment of the Court of First Instance is now familiar to the world, and it is most satisfactory to know that it maintains the English position until a superior Court shall upset or vary it. Seldom has such a small point involved such a vast amount of legal learning. Mr. Scaife's opening argument alone fills some 120 pages of printed matter (royal 8vo), to say nothing of the defendants' answer, their supplemental answer, and Mr. Scaife's reply. But the main arguments are of a very simple nature, and as the judgment has been given on the broad lines indicated in it, it is only necessary to refer very shortly to the main line of argument adopted.

The defendants rested their case on the fact that, until the Act of 1891 became law, the word "book" in American Copyright statutes and legal decisions included "musical composition"; that this was also the case, and still is the case, under the English Copyright law; and that the use of the word "musical composition" in the Act of 1891 does not deprive the word "book" of the comprehensive meaning given to it in the law courts prior to the Act of 1891.

The plaintiffs maintained that this is not a copyright case at all; that it is purely a case of statutory construction, and that it matters not what used to be the law in America or what is the law in England, as the whole question depends upon the meaning of the actual words used in the sections above set out. It was claimed that when the Act enumerates sixteen things (of which "book" is one and "musical composition" is another), and declares that under certain considerations they shall enjoy copyright in America, and then goes on to stipulate that in the case of four only of the sixteen (of which four "book" is one but "musical composition" is not one), certain other conditions are to be observed, those conditions apply only to the four that are enumerated, and not to the twelve which are not; and that whatever meaning "book" may have had in America prior to the Act of 1891, or still has in England, the expression could not any longer include "musical composition" so far as the Act of 1891 is concerned, seeing that in that Act the two expressions appear side by side in the same sections of the Act. In other words, the Act of 1891 broke up the former conglomerate meaning of the word "book," and the broken fragments are dealt with in a different way according to the well-known intentions of the framers of the Act.

Whether the view maintained by the plaintiffs' counsel is a correct one is no longer a question of argument outside the Court of Appeal, as it is entirely confirmed by the judgment of Judge Colt in the following words:—

JUDGMENT.

Colt, J.: This case raises a new and important question under the Copyright Act of March 3, 1891. (26 Stat. 1106.)

The plaintiffs, subjects of Great Britain, and publishers of music, have copyrighted three musical compositions, two of which are in the form of sheet-music, and one a cantata consists of some ninety pages of music bound together in book form and with a paper cover. Two of these pieces were printed from electrotype plates, and one from stone by the lithographic process. The inquiry in this case is whether a musical composition is a book or lithograph within the meaning of the proviso in Sec. 3 of the Act, which declares that in the case of a "book, photograph, chromo, or lithograph" the two copies required to be deposited with the Librarian of Congress shall be manufactured in this country.

The Act of March 3, 1891, is an amendment of the copyright law then existing; the principal change made is the extension of the privilege of copyright to foreigners by the removal of the restriction of citizenship or residence contained in the old law, and hence it is sometimes called the International Copyright Act.

Section 1 relates to the subject-matter of copyright, and declares that "the author, inventor, designer or proprietor of any book, map, chart, dramatic or musical composition, engraving, cut, print, or photograph or negative thereof, or of a painting, drawing, chromo, statue, statuary, . . . shall, upon complying with the provisions of this chapter, have the sole liberty of printing, reprinting, publishing," etc.

Section 3 recites the conditions which must be complied with, and says:

[The Judge here read the 3rd Section already quoted at the beginning of this article.]

From the language of these provisions it seems clear that "book" was not intended to include "musical composition." In the section which enumerates the things which may be copyrighted musical composition is mentioned as something different from book, and we find this same distinction twice observed in the preceding part of the section which contains the proviso. It is as reasonable to suppose that book and musical composition were as much intended to refer to different subjects as map, chart, engraving, and other enumerated articles.

If Congress in the proviso had intended to include a musical composition among those copyrighted things which must be manufactured in this country, it should have incorporated it in the list of things subject to this restriction. The omission in the proviso of musical composition as well as of map, chart, engraving, and other things before enumerated is very significant as indicating that Congress never intended to extend this provision to any of these articles. And so with respect to lithograph, if Congress had intended to cover by that word a musical composition made by the lithographic process, it should have expressed its meaning in clear and unambiguous terms in view of the language used in other portions of the statute.

If there is any doubt as to the meaning of the statute it is proper to examine the history of legislation on this subject in order, if possible, to discover the intent of Congress. As the bill passed the House of Representatives this proviso was limited to book, but when it reached the Senate an amendment was offered and passed extending the proviso to various other subjects of copyright, as map, dramatic or musical composition, engraving, cut, print, etc. A conference committee was appointed, and a compromise was agreed to enlarging the House provision by the addition of photograph, chromo, or lithograph, and the bill was finally passed in this form. In the debate in the Senate, reference was made to the fact that musical compositions had been eliminated from the proviso. The first and fundamental rule in the interpretation of statutes is to carry out the intent of the legislature, if it can be ascertained, and I think that an examination of the proceedings in Congress shows that it was intended to exclude musical compositions from the operation of this proviso. Cong. Rec., Vol. 22, Part 1, p. 32; Part 3, pp. 2378, 2836; Part 4, p. 3847.

Book has been distinguished from musical composition in the statutes relating to copyright since 1831. (4 Stat. 436.) The specific designation of any article in an Act, or series of Acts, of Congress requires that such article be treated by itself, and excludes it from general terms contained in the same Act, or in subsequent Acts. Potter's Dwarris on Statutes, pp. 198, 272; Homer v. The Collector, 1 Wall. 486; Arthur v. Lahey, 96 U. S. 112; Arthur v. Stephani, Ibid. 125; Vietor v. Arthur, 104 U. S. 498.

If, in a popular sense, and speaking particularly in reference to form, book may be said to include a musical composition, the answer to this proposition is that where two words of a statute are coupled together, one of which generically includes the other, the more general term is used in a meaning exclusive of the specific one. Endlich on the Interpretation of Statutes, Sect. 396; Reiche v. Smythe, 13 Wall. 162.

The reasoning upon which this rule of specific designation is based is that such designation is expressive of the legislative intention to exclude the article specifically named from the general term which might otherwise include it. Smythe v. Fiske, 23 Wall. 374, 380; Reiche v. Smythe, 13 Wall. 162, 164.

The English cases cited by the defendant to the effect that book includes musical composition are not material in the present controversy, because the statute law of the two countries is different. The early English Statute of 8 Anne, c. 19, says in the preamble "books and other writings," while in the modern English Statute, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, § 2, book is defined to include various specific things, as map, chart, sheet of music, etc. Nor do the American cases cited, Clayton v. Stone, 2 Paine, 382; Scoville v. Toland, 6 West Law Jour. 84; Drury v. Ewing, 1 Bond, 540, help the defendant. In none of these cases has the question ever been determined whether a musical composition is a book. It must also be remembered that the question now presented is not strictly whether a musical composition can ever be regarded as a book, but whether Congress meant in the Act of March 3, 1891, to include musical composition within the terms of the proviso referred to.

Nor do I think the dictionary definitions of book render us much assistance, because the word is used in so many different senses; it may refer to the subject-matter, as literary composition; or to form, as a number of leaves of paper bound together; or a written instrument or document; or a particular subdivision of a literary composition; or the words of an opera, etc.

Looking at the natural reading of the statute, the intent of Congress, and the rules which govern the construction of statute law, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs have complied with the provisions of the Act of March 3, 1891, respecting the three musical compositions complained of, and that the defendant should be enjoined from reprinting, publishing, or exposing for sale these compositions, or any essential part of them, as prayed for in the bill.

Injunction granted.

The defendants have already signified their intention of appealing against this decision, and there is a probability that the appeal will be very shortly heard. In the meantime it is a matter of congratulation that Messrs. Novello and Co., first of all by themselves, and afterwards with the assistance of their confrères, but from beginning to end through the splendid work done by their counsel, Mr. Scaife, have so far been successful in securing a copyright in America unencumbered by the necessity of setting up their type and printing their works there. And it should not be forgotten that, although this has been a publisher's action, it has been fought, at great cost, in the interest of Copyright as a property, and that every music-composer, whether English, German, or French, will reap an immeasurable benefit from the enterprise and determination of the Plaintiffs and those who so patriotically supported them.

FROM MY STUDY.

THE portraits now presented are personal illustrations of the great school of pianoforte playing which flourished through the early decades of the present century, and down to the period of "higher development"—a school distinguished by—to use the words of a well-known writer—"the most smooth and equable touch, the most perfect legato, with supple wrists and quiet position of the hands, a suave and singing tone, capable of endless modifications and delicate shades of expression." Pianists of this order have nearly all passed away, along with the instruments upon which they performed, and we shall never see their like again, whether the deprivation be for good or for evil. Vanished, too, is most of the music with which they charmed the world; the surviving examples living on more by the vitality of inspiration than by appreciation as music for the pianoforte. Still, let us praise famous men and the fathers of art who preceded us. There is much still to be learned from them.

Marie Felicité Denise Moke (Madame Pleyel), whom the annexed portrait shows in the plenitude of her early charms, was a native of Paris, where she was born in 1811. This lady had a personal history scarcely less interesting than that which musical lexicographers have written about her artistic career. For many years her life was a striking illustration of the fascinating power which a gifted and beautiful woman can exercise, if she please, upon the opposite sex. The incident which Berlioz describes in a famous chapter of his autobiography shows how early, and with what force, she began her witchery. It is true that Berlioz had a volcanic nature. He resembled one of those easily irritated geysers into which you drop a single stone, and, the next minute, see it flying upward in a storm of hot water. It is true, also, that the French romanticist had a lively imagination, and sometimes confused its suggestions with facts. But, making all due allowances, no doubt remains that when Mdlle. Moke jilted her absent lover he was profoundly moved. We are not compelled to believe his story of the disguise and the armoury of lethal weapons with which, on revengeful thoughts intent, he set out from Rome to Paris. But the poor moth was badly singed by the fickle flame of the candle which attracted him. Mdlle. Moke, not long after, married Camille Pleyel, eldest son of Ignaz Pleyel, the composer and founder of the still existing pianoforte manufactory. But the lady by no means settled down to matronly duties. Both as artist and woman she had the world at her feet, and the position was one to be enjoyed. If we follow her triumphal progresses from city to city she is found always in an atmosphere of fascination. The greatest musicians of the day were proud to hold her fan, and Liszt, on one occasion, not only led her to the pianoforte, but turned the leaves of her music. She came to England (1846) and met with equal success, dazzling the eyes of the critics as much by personal charm as by executive skill. Some of them appear to me to have lost their hearts when I read their passionate eulogies. In all this there was nothing new. The magnetism of sex under certain conditions is a very old story.

Madame Pleyel's development as an artist was quite premature, though it does not appear that she figured as an infant prodigy. She had the best masters of her time—Herz, Moscheles, Kalkbrenner—who taught her when themselves in the fulness of power, but, according to the highest authorities, she owed more to her own unflagging industry. If genius be "the faculty of taking pains," then Madame Pleyel undoubtedly had genius. Anyhow, the clever Parisienne possessed talents and ambition which, in alliance with an all-subduing personality, carried her to the highest pinnacle of fame. In 1848 Madame Pleyel, though then only thirty-seven years of age, accepted the post of Professor of the Pianoforte in the Brussels Conservatoire, and retained it till 1872. She died March 30, 1875.

From a great French pianist I turn to a famous German professor and composer for his instrument—Adolph Henselt. This well-known master was born at Bavarian Schwabach, May 12, 1814, three years later than Madame Pleyel, and within a year or two of a host of men distinguished in music. Though a distinctly remarkable and, in some respects, an original executant, Henselt did comparatively little before the public. It was not his fate to travel through the civilised world as a blazing meteor attracting all eyes. Even when he visited England in 1852 and 1867, and was surrounded by powerful temptations to appear upon the concert platform, he successfully resisted them all, consenting only to play at Messrs. Broadwood's before an invited company. Constitutional nervousness is said to have been the cause of his aversion to public performance. With regard to Henselt's method, which has been described as in some respects original, it is best to let the authoritative voice of Mr. Dannreuther be heard:

"Henselt's ways at the keyboard may be taken as the link between Hummel's and Liszt's; that is to say, with Hummel's strictly legato touch, quiet hands and strong fingers, Henselt produces effects of rich sonority, something like those which Liszt gets with the aid of the wrists and pedals. But as such sonority, apart from any rhythmical accentuation, depends in the main upon the widespread disposition of chords and arpeggii, the component notes of which are made to extend beyond the limits of an octave, Henselt's way of holding the keys down as much as possible with the fingers, over and above keeping the dampers raised by means of the pedals, does not seem the most practical; for it necessitates a continuous straining of the muscles such as only hands of abnormal construction, or fingers stretched to the utmost by incessant and tortuous practice can stand. . . . Nevertheless, be his method of touch needlessly cumbrous or not, if applied to effects à la Chopin and Liszt, the result under his own hand is grand; so grand, indeed, that though his appearances in public have been fewer than those of any other celebrated pianist, he has been hailed by judges like Robert Schumann and Herr von Lenz as one of the greatest players."

Reference to Henselt as a composer appears almost superfluous, so well known are the works upon which his reputation is based, and in right of which his name will descend to posterity. The Concerto in F minor has repeatedly been heard in this country, and, though not among first favourites, seems likely to retain its place on the active list. His twelve Studies all pianists know as works which are something more than they assert themselves to be, and, like those of Chopin, have a purely lyrical as well as technical value. Henselt is a popular composer for the pianoforte on the strength of a number of drawing-room pieces not to be surpassed for grace and elegance. The "Wiegenlied" and the "Gondola" may be examples of art which does not aim very high, but, nevertheless, is perfect art in its way. A composer of such things does more good than many people imagine. He decks with flowers and graceful forms the portals of the temple of music, attracting many who otherwise might pass by unregarding. Henselt settled in St. Petersburg when a young man of twenty-four, and there made his home for life, ultimately holding the position of Court pianist, teacher of the Imperial children, and Inspector of the Russian Seminaries for women.

It remains to speak of another pianist who settled in the capital of the Czar, and made himself renowned. This is John Field, called "Russian Field," to distinguish him from Henry Field of Bath, who, be it added, was every way a much smaller man. John was by birth an Irishman—most likely, by descent also—and first saw the light in Dublin, July 26, 1782. He studied the pianoforte under Clementi, and from that master derived a perfect method, but a taste for music seems to have been inherited from his father, who was a violinist, and his grandfather, an organist. It cannot be said of Field's early course that the valleys were exalted and the mountains and hills brought low. The "ups and downs" were considerable, sometimes painful, as when, in early youth, he ran away from home to escape the relentless rule of his father and grandfather, who kept him always hard at work. His wanderings as a vagrant were soon cut short by hunger and wretchedness. Even when apprenticed to Clementi, Field was in hardly better case. His master kept a shop, and made him sell music as well as study the pianoforte. Indeed, it is difficult to say whether Clementi regarded him the more as a shopman or a pupil, for when Spohr visited St. Petersburg he discovered the young Dubliner showing off pianofortes in his chief's warehouse—"a pale, melancholy youth, awkward and shy, speaking no language but his own, and in clothes which he had far outgrown; but who had only to place his hands on the keys for all such drawbacks to be at once forgotten."

Clementi, who took his apprentice to St. Petersburg as a shopman, left him there as a teacher. Then Field had his chance, and for a long time made the best of it, his services being much in request, and his success in the Concert-room immense. Unlike Henselt, he courted the public voice, playing in all the great towns of Europe, and enjoying the enthusiastic acclaim of his audiences. Coming to London in 1832, Field appeared at a Philharmonic Concert, playing a Concerto from his own pen. He afterwards visited Italy, but this was his last venture—last not because the Concerts did not pay, but for the reason that the demon of drink obtained a complete mastery, and wrecked yet another precious life. In Naples, it is said, he was reduced to utter misery, and lay for nine months in a public hospital. There he was found by one of his adopted countrymen named Raemonoff and by him taken in charge en route for Moscow. Passing through Vienna, the shattered man made his last public appearance, his return to Moscow being scarcely accomplished before death claimed him. He perished —that is the proper word—in January, 1837, in his fifty-fifth year.

Field was the author of many large musical works, including seven Concertos, but, like his successor, Henselt, he lives chiefly in effusions of smaller pretence. In point of fact, he is "Field of the Nocturnes," and little else. It would be superfluous to dwell upon the charm of the pieces with which the Irish pianist is most closely associated. Some of these Mr. Dannreuther has spoken of as "the very essence of all idylls and eclogues, 'Poésies intimes' of simple charm and inimitable grace, such as no undue popularity can render stale, no sham imitation nauseous."

Field has an almost equally great claim upon respect and gratitude in that he has been a model for musicians even greater than himself. The Nocturnes of the Irish composer were not only precursors, but the suggestors of the Nocturnes by Chopin. Again I quote the authority already cited: "Both as a player and a composer, Chopin, and with him all modern pianists, are much indebted to Field. The form of Chopin's weird Nocturnes, the kind of emotion embodied therein, the type of melody and its graceful embellishments, the peculiar waving accompaniments in widespread chords, with their vaguely prolonged sound resting on the pedals—all this, and more, we owe to Field." Here is a splendid tribute, such as alone might make welcome the portrait now before the reader. X.

ENGLISH MUSIC.

In a review of Dr. Parry's new book, "The Art of Music," which appeared in the World, the critic was good enough to go out of his way to give that distinguished Englishman advice as to his proper sphere in art. Leave oratorio writing, he said, and turn to instrumental music, of which you have given us such splendid examples. "Job" and "Judith" are not to be compared in interest with the "Overture to an Unwritten Tragedy" and the "English Symphony." Now these are the sort of thoughtless remarks which have lately become common in certain circles. It is the fashion to point the critical finger of scorn at our Cantatas and Oratorios; to call them "Festival manufacture" (as indeed they are, but why to their disadvantage?), and, in general, to attempt to discourage the only national school of music we possess. The majority of these productions may be of the nature of occasional music; the commonplace of the age, and of little value to the world at large, but even then they are useful to us. Chorus-singing is the one thing that we do more, and perhaps better, than any nation in the world. We must have something new to sing. Our provincial Festivals, which multiply yearly, are the direct cause of a great deal of music being written, and, on the whole, adequately performed. It must, therefore, be in this direction that any greatness that is to fall to our lot will come upon us. We have no instrumental traditions, and but little adequate performance of instrumental music. The best of it is under foreign direction, and comes from foreign sources. Who, then, in their senses, could advise Dr. Parry, or any other English composer, to turn away from all the national traditions and devote himself to those which we have derived from Germany?

The English oratorio has tended hitherto to be a bastard production, with no definite style or object. Years ago it was mostly Handel: then there came an infusion of Spohr and Mendelssohn; now it not unfrequently holds a little Wagner in solution, and attempts elaborate dramatic developments. All to no purpose. Such work may have great qualities, but it is not English oratorio music, either in spirit or expression.

Englishmen have been so long under the domination of Italian and German masters that they have almost forgotten the possibilities of their own language. It is usual to accept the statement that English is a bad language to sing without question; indeed, we make this our principal excuse for singing so much in foreign languages. And yet English is full of possibilities. No language is so good an expression for our emotions as that to which we were born, if only we had composers to treat it adequately.

Addison pointed out long ago, in the Spectator, the weakness of adopting Italian traditions into English music. "The tone, or (as the French call it) the accent of every nation in their ordinary speech, is altogether different from that of every other people, as we may see in the Welsh and Scotch, who border so near upon us. By the tone or accent, I do not mean the sound of each particular word, but the sound of the whole sentence. . . .

"For this reason, the recitative music in every language should be as different as the tone or accent of each language, for otherwise what may properly express a passion in one language will not do it in another. . . .

"Thus the notes of interrogation or admiration in the Italian music (if one may so call them), which resemble their accents in discourse on such occasions are not unlike the ordinary tones of an English voice when we are angry. . . . For this reason the Italian artists cannot agree with our English musicians in admiring Purcell's compositions, and thinking his tunes so wonderfully adapted to his words: because both nations do not always express the same passions by the same sounds.

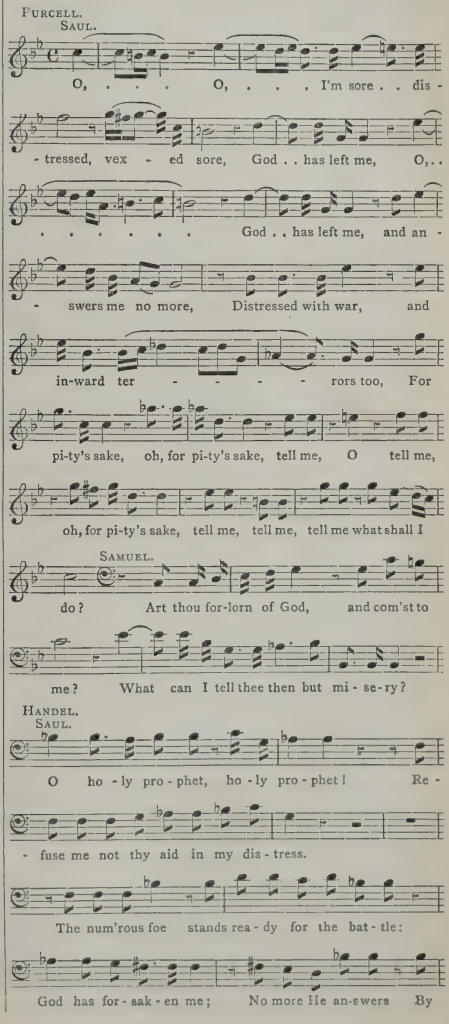
"I am, therefore, humbly of opinion that an English composer should not follow the Italian recitative too servilely, but make use of many gentle deviations from it in compliance with his own native language, and remember that he ought to accommodate himself to an English audience; and by humouring the tone of our voices in ordinary conversation have the same regard to the accent of his own language as those persons had to theirs whom he professes to imitate."

Unfortunately this most sensible criticism has been forgotten by the majority of the composers which England has produced. The tyranny of Italian and German tradition has proved too strong for our weaker musical individuality. The consequence has been that English has suffered under an unjust stigma as a vehicle of music. It is no inherent fault in the language that it does not fall into the cadence of Italian music at all, and is only partially suited to the phrases of German composers.

There was, however, as Addison notes, one composer of first-rate genius, who tried to treat the English language as it deserved, and that was Purcell. Living in an age, when music was in its boyhood, he affected many puerilities of imitation, and antiquated ornaments, now long discarded, but in understanding the capabilities of expression contained in our mother tongue, he has never been equalled.

The advent of Handel crushed him out of the recollection of his compatriots, although Handel, as a foreigner, was in this respect infinitely his inferior. It may seem a strong statement, but in the majority of cases English words fit to Handel's phrases no better than careful translations from an Italian original might be expected to do. To take the first examples that come to hand, can any one pretend that "He was despised" or "I know that my Redeemer liveth" is the natural cadence of those English words? Compare, in respect of its fitness for the English words, Purcell's well-known "I attempt from love's sickness to fly." After all, these are "airs"; in all formal melodies, words may be allowed to yield to the paramount claims of music, and no one pretends to question the magnificent power with which Handel's genius expresses the sentiment of the words. But in recitative, where language is more essentially concerned, the case is much stronger. Purcell's extraordinary striving for expression almost chokes his utterance, while Handel for the most part contents himself with the commonplace of Italian tradition.

Compare, for example, parallel settings of the scene of Saul with the Witch of Endor; the contrast is most striking and instructive as the words are in part the same—



Purcell.
Saul.
O, . . . O, . . . I'm sore . . dis -
- tressed, vex - ed sore, God . . has left me, O,. .
. . . . . God . . has left me, and an -
- swers me no more, Distressed with war, and in-ward ter - - - - rors too, For pi-ty's sake, oh, for pi-ty's sake, tell me, O tell me, oh, for pi-ty's sake, tell me, tell me, tell me what shall I Samuel.
do? Art thou for-lorn of God, and com'st to me? What can I tell thee then but mi - se - ry?
Handel.
Saul.
O ho - ly pro - phet, ho - ly pro - phet! Re -
- fuse me not thy aid in my dis - tress.
The num'rous foe stands rea - dy for the bat - tle:
God has for - sak - en me; No more He an-swers By pro-phets or by dreams: No hope re -

- mains Un-less I learn from thee what course to take.
SAMUEL.
Hath God for-sak-en thee? and dost thou ask My coun-sel?

Or again—

PURCELL.
Thou and thy son, to-mor-row, to-mor-row, thou and thy son . . shall be . . . . with me be - neath.
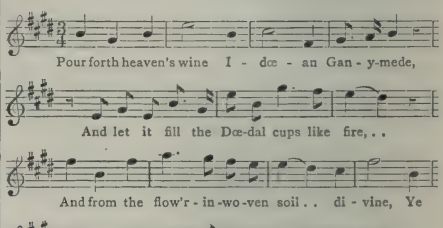
HANDEL.
Thou and thy sons shall be with me to -
- mor-row, And Is - ra-el, &c.

The final roulade on the word "be" in Purcell, fine as it is, is a blemish to the recitative; the repetition of the words may sound somewhat antiquated; but in understanding, for the cadence of the sentences and the force of single words, Handel cannot compare at all with the Englishman. Equal notes do not suit the words, and though, of course, in this respect the singer might take liberties, nothing could make "and dost thou ask my counsel" sound English, or "no more he answers," while Purcell's setting of the parallel phrases are perfection.

I have often wished, in the days of my enthusiasm, that it were possible to rewrite and reset Purcell's recitatives, his great cantatas (sacred and secular), more in accordance with modern ideas—that is to say, with judicious curtailment. An unpardonable piece of vandalism, of course, but an excellent object lesson for English composers. The modern public will never listen again to Purcell because of those disfiguring roulades and puerilities; he is practically unknown even to the majority of musicians; but if by any means the strivings of his essentially modern spirit could be made familiar to us, we might, by degrees, become less contented with our foreign traditions.

Failing this possibility, it is delightful to find the same high qualities in Dr. Parry's music. In "Prometheus Unbound" he gave us a magnificent example of the dramatic cantata, which went as near to obtaining the technical standard of Wagner as anything of the kind could; but that was many years ago. In his later works Dr. Parry has gradually developed indications, to be found there in a lesser degree, into a style, which is a far truer expression of what is essentially English. It has become usual in newspaper notices to style him "The English Bach," and certainly he resembles the great John Sebastian in his power of managing huge vocal scores, but in other respects his style is essentially different. His counterpoint is of Italian origin, although, of course, enriched with modern harmony; and his phrasing is essentially English; and, therefore, his melodies and recitatives frequently resemble Purcell's very closely. I do not mean that he has copied the elder composer's mannerisms, or even made a deliberate study of his style, but that the same causes have led to the same result in the two cases. The English language has still the same natural cadence and accent that it had in the days of Purcell, and the result is that the form of its expression must remain the same, if justice be done to its natural capabilities.

As examples of simple melody compare Dr. Parry's air from "Prometheus Unbound":—



Pour forth heaven's wine I - dæ - an Gan - y-mede,
And let it fill the Dæ-dal cups like fire, . .
And from the flow'r - in-wo-ven soil . . di - vine, Ye all tri-umph-ant har-mon-ies a - rise.

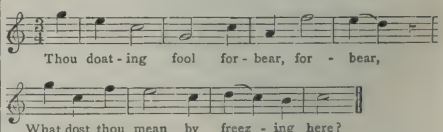
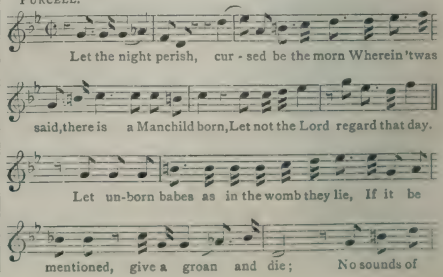
with Purcell's



But it is in the freer form of recitative that the matter at issue is most plainly shown. It happens that Purcell has also set the Lamentations of Job (in a lamed verse form) and it will therefore be interesting (and sufficient for the present purpose) to set that work beside Parry's latest oratorio, without going into further quotation.

Purcell's cantata is only two pages long, and I give all the most important phrases from it.



PURCELL.
Let the night perish, cur - sed be the morn Wherein 'twas said, there is a Manchild born, Let not the Lord regard that day.
Let un-born babes as in the womb they lie, If it be mentioned, give a groan and die; No sounds of joy therein shall charm the ear, No sun, no moon, no twilight stars ap - pear. But a thick veil of gloom - y darkness wear. Then had I been at qui et.

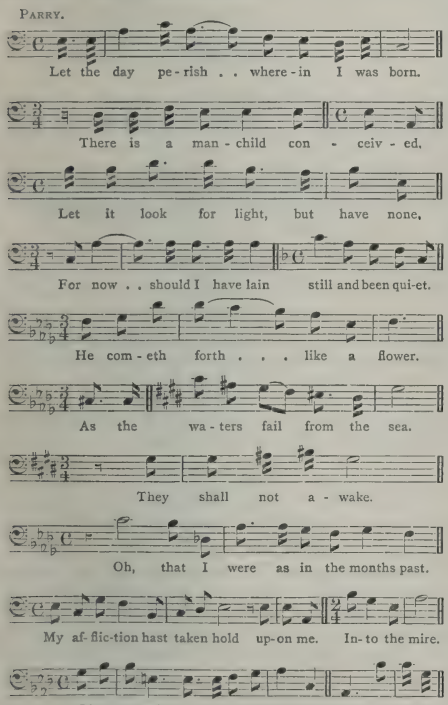
And mine eyes had slept and, There, there.
Lye hush'd in si-lence, There's no mid-night cry.

(I have written out the appoggiaturas in this passage, as is usual in modern music.)

The extracts from Parry's "Job" are shorter, because the work is accessible to every one.



Parry.
Let the day pe - rish . . where - in I was born.
There is a man - child con - ceiv - ed.
Let it look for light, but have none,
For now . . should I have lain still and been qui-et.
He com - eth forth . . . like a flower.
As the wa - ters fail from the sea.
They shall not a - wake.
Oh, that I were as in the months past.
My af-flic-tion hast taken hold up-on me. In-to the mire.
I have ut-ter'd that I un-derstood not. Dust and ashes.

Surely no one can peruse these extracts without seeing the singularly close resemblance of their style. With the exception of the characteristic repetition "There—There—," which is a well-known mannerism of Purcell's, I believe there is no phrase which might not have appeared in Dr. Parry's work without being perfectly suited to the rest. The Purcell syncopations, "slept," "hush'd," "twilight," are to be found in "forth like a flower," "affliction," "uttered": the fall of a diminished fifth of the last is so exceedingly characteristic of Purcell's writing that similar passages in Handel's works have been attributed to the influence of Purcell. Then the frequent dotted rhythm is common to both, and Dr. Parry's favourite dactylic rhythm—"-in I was born," "shall not a-wake"—occurs at least once in Purcell's "let not the Lord." These are, of course, the result of the verbal peculiarities of the English language, and are matters quite apart from that cadence of sentence of which Addison speaks. If we test the two extracts from this point of view, first declaiming the sentences and then observing how they have been translated into music, the truth of the recitative will become at once apparent. From this point of view I could not forbear quoting the magnificent "dust and ashes" with which Job's repentance closes, although that is too intensely dramatic to find a parallel, as far as I know, even in Purcell. In conclusion, as to the form of the work, with its huge lamentations, which, when it was produced at Gloucester, was stated to be "probably the longest bass solo in existence." Limiting "existence" to works of English origin, it is to be paralleled in Purcell's cantatas, if anywhere. Turning over some volumes of his sacred music, I find that "a paraphrase of the 34th chapter of Isaiah by Mr. Cowley," set also for bass voice, extends to 228 bars. The "lamentations" contain 301 bars, but that is inclusive of many symphonies, and the time is often quick, while Purcell's cantata, being throughout slower, would take certainly longer to perform. This is of course a trivial point, but it is remarkable how alike in character the works are. Both contain an alternation of recitative and measured melody, and are attempts to interpret the sense of the Bible, verse by verse, into music without any of the aids of contrast afforded by the choir or change of voice.

That such inward musings, however distinguished by concentrated expression, should be found dreary by the general public is only natural. People demand, above all things, variety, and variety in thought and expression is naturally not so obvious as variety in outward form. But to musicians this very sameness of form should be an interest. It enables them to perceive the range of varied effect which the genius of the composer can give to one human voice, apart from all adventitious aid.

But there is another reason why neither Parry nor Purcell are easily intelligible to an ordinary audience. They use, as I have tried to show, a form of expression which is unfamiliar to our ears. We are accustomed to German and Italian phrases set to English words, so twisted as to suit them, and here is the inspiration of our mother tongue pure and simple. It is for this reason that Dr. Parry's music has for English musicians so absorbing an interest, and it is for this reason that, great as he has shown himself in the composition of instrumental music, we look rather to his cantatas and oratorios to influence the future of our national music, and await his new work, "King Saul," with the utmost interest.

We have an ever-increasing fund of musical talent in this country, but we have hitherto lacked that national individuality which Wagner declares essential to all real music, and which the English choral works, if composers will follow true English traditions, will some day give us.

BEETHOVEN'S SKETCH BOOKS.

By J. S. SHEDLOCK, B.A.

No. III.—SONATAS, DIABELLI VARIATIONS, SYMPHONIES, "LEONORE" OVERTURE, MASS IN D, &c.

SKETCHES of the early Pianoforte Sonatas (Op. 2, Nos. 1, 2, and 3) are scarce. Here is one from the development section of the opening movement of the Sonata in A (No. 2):—

Among sketches for the Sonata in B flat (Op. 22) we meet with the following passage from the Rondo—

The composer had not yet hit on the happy expedient of commencing the counterpoint to the bass motive on the second quaver of the bar.

Again, with regard to the theme of the Variations in the A flat Sonata (Op. 26), Nottebohm in a sketch ("Zweite Beethoveniana," p. 237) shows us that the middle section of the theme was at first very different. But more than this can be said; for when Beethoven tried again he only got half way towards the finished form. He wrote, it is true—but followed it by—which is tame and monotonous as compared with the published version.

Here is a sketch for the opening of the first movement of the Sonata in E (Op. 109)— but soon afterwards, on the same page, comes—as in the published version, except for the crotchet stems. Then we have one of the Adagio espressivo—

Let us now turn to some interesting sketches of several of the Diabelli Variations (Op. 120), none of which have been given by Nottebohm. If the Breitkopf and Härtel edition be compared with the Peters, it will be found that in the second part of Var. 12 the former has one bar less than the latter, in which is omitted. Now a sketch of this variation differs considerably from the printed version, and cannot therefore be strictly compared. It is, however, curious to note that in the sketch the second part commences directly with—the passage is terser, bolder than in the printed version.

In—

Var. 13, from the 4th bar of 2nd part.

The sketch of Var. 14 commences thus—which, with its closer drawing together of the motive in the second bar, is thoroughly Beethovenish.

In the following sketch of the last four bars of Var. 16—we see how carefully the composer laid the harmonic structure on which he built his figuration.

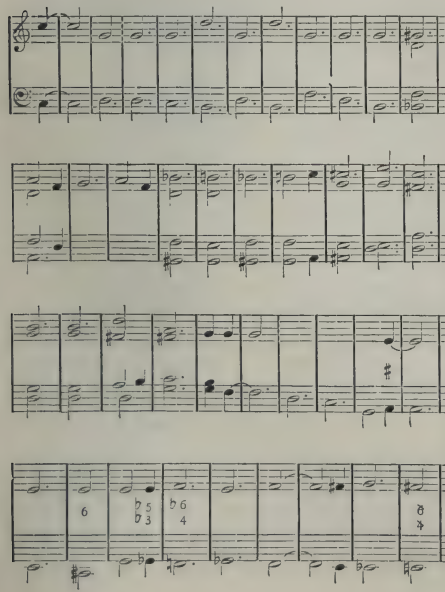
And in the following—



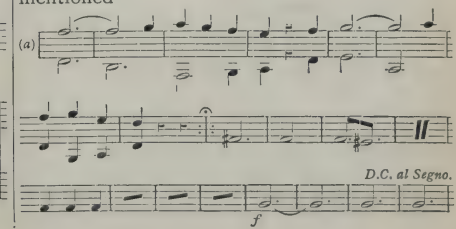
we have a most remarkable sketch of Var. 20, remarkable alike in its differences from and likenesses to the printed version. By the way, do not the first bars recall the opening of the Arietta of the Pianoforte Sonata in C minor (Op. 111)? Beethoven had both these works in hand at the same time.

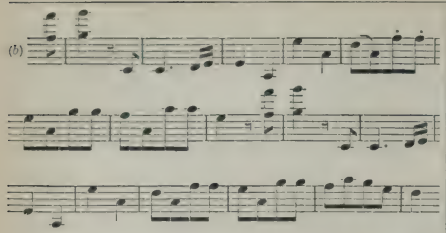
On a loose sheet in the Berlin Library we find—

These are passages from the Pianoforte Concerto in G; the first will be found on p. 47 of the B. and H. score, the second on p. 43, and the last on p. 14.

Genius has been named the art of taking pains, and here we find Beethoven carefully fingering special bars; and the fingering itself is of no ordinary kind. The note to the second example remarks that the thumb (curiously marked in the examples by a 1 with a dot over it) or first finger is to be immediately passed under. He means under the other fingers, so as to be ready for the d at the end of the bar.

In "Ein Skizzenbuch von Beethoven," of Nottebohm, there is a long sketch of the Finale of the Symphony in D, and in his "Zweite Beethoveniana," pp. 244 and 245, there is another of the first movement. The two following, however, the one (a) of the third movement, the other (b) of the Finale, are new, and, apparently, earlier than the above-mentioned—





In a Sketch Book (Q. 38) we find two passages belonging to the first movement of the C minor Symphony. Beethoven writes in pencil—and then underneath in ink—

and again—

which should be compared with the corresponding passage in the Symphony (B. and H. score, p. 6). Beethoven never seemed to get at once what he wanted. Patientiâ vinces must have been his motto.

Here are two attractive sketches from another book (W. 30); one of the Scherzo, which should be compared with No. 4, on p. 63 of Nottebohm's "Beethoveniana"— and the other of the Finale, and, apparently, a very early one—

On a loose sheet we have a sketch of the close of the slow movement of the C minor Symphony, beginning—the lower part evidently to be read in the bass, the upper one in the treble clef. Then comes a long sketch of the Scherzo, beginning—

On the next page, however, we find the following extraordinary version in big notes, and written with the master's special (red) pencil—

the ending of the movement as originally planned.

Of the so-called* second and third "Leonore" Overtures only few sketches exist. Of the former Nottebohm gives five ("Zweite Beethoveniana," pp. 453 and 459). To these we are able to add a few more from a Sketch Book in the Berlin Library. The first refers to the opening Adagio—

It ends with the opening of Florestan's air. This theme is common to the second and third Overtures: there are, however, slight differences, and from them we are able to decide that this and, most probably, the sketches which follow on without interruption refer to No. 2. The series of dotted minims which precede the Florestan theme seem to refer to the bass of the passage which immediately follows this theme in the published version.

Then we have an attempt at the principal theme of the Allegro—

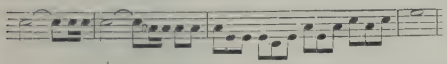
in the Coda of No. 3; but here it seems a first idea, for the theme now gradually takes shape. Lower down, and written in very clear notes in pencil, comes—

* The Overture published after Beethoven's death as Op. 138 was supposed to have been written for Prague in 1807 or 1808, and, in this case, the above would really be the first and second. It must, however, be remembered that Schindler states that the one published as Op. 138 was really written first, and set aside as not being of sufficient importance. Otto Jahn, too, in the preface to his vocal score of the opera "Leonore," in its first and second versions, considers that there is no true foundation for Seyfried's statement that it was written for Prague.

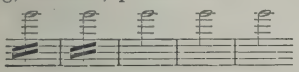
Then begin workings with the dotted minim in the second bar. And, finally, we arrive at—

Soon we have the trumpet call—



The passage would seem to be in the key of A flat. Just before this, however, occurs the Florestan theme in augmentation—

The above ought to be compared with Nottebohm's first sketch ("Zweite Beethoveniana," p. 453); there we have double, here quadruple augmentation as in the published Overture. The workings for the Coda do not as yet show an approach to the printed version. The following, however, points towards the close—



Of several short sketches which seem to refer to passages in the opera, one is of particular interest. It is as follows—

Now in the original form of the opera (as performed in 1805) the concluding bars of the Terzet, "Euch werde Lohn," differ from those of the published version, and are as follows—

Possibly the first sketch for the great Mass in D is to be found, not in a sketch book, but in a remarkable autograph preserved in the Royal Library, Berlin. As a preparation for his work he wrote out the Latin words, marking at the same time the quantities. In this document, written in 1818, we find the following—

That was evidently a favourite theme with the composer. We meet with it again—or, to be exact, the first five minims—among some sketches for the C sharp minor Quartet, in a book which, according to Nottebohm, was not used by Beethoven until the Mass had been finished and produced.

There are sketches for the Mass in an important book belonging to A. Artaria, but there are one or two interesting references to it in the Berlin Library Sketch Books. Here is one—and here, for the sake of comparison, the passage in the Mass to which it refers—

The first bar of the above sketch is a foreshadowing of the bass of the ff passage preceding our quotation—

In another Sketch Book (F. 78), at the top of a page, we come across the following—

Wünsche den Augustinen mit diesen
2 Chören* — — eine Messe oder Te Deum Laudamus.

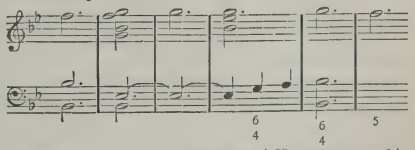
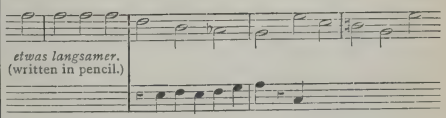
followed by—



(See B. and H. score, p. 136.)

and then—



the lower stave requiring of course the C clef on the fourth line.

On the other side of the page we find—which really bears no resemblance to the printed passage.

There is a Sketch Book (Gr. 5) devoted entirely to the Mass in D, and written almost entirely in pencil; some of the sketches have been inked over. It would seem as if this book must be a treasure-store from whence to extract interesting examples; but in many cases it is impossible even to follow the thread of the composer's thoughts.

* Two words here are illegible.

Not counting a wild page at the end, the very last sketch is—

(The parts for violins and basses, p. 204, bars 5 and 6, of B. and H. score.)

With this sketch we must conclude the second series; not, however, for want of material, for the master's Sketch Books seem inexhaustible.

IS MUSIC PLAYED OUT?

We at once hasten to re-assure our readers who may fear that the query at the head of this article is intended to initiate a correspondence, such as our daily brethren delight in at this season of the year. No, our intention is simply to confront the reader with certain remarkable facts and figures which will give him, perhaps for the first time, some idea of the vastness of the domain of music; and when this is duly apprehended, there can be, we opine, but one answer to the question.

It is common to hear musicians complain of the difficulty they have in finding anything new to say, now that so very much has been written, and wonder is frequently expressed that the possible combinations of the seven notes of a key are so numerous; but few people have the least idea how inexhaustible those combinations actually are. In speaking of the possible changes which may be rung on a peal of six, seven, or eight bells, an array of figures is often given which does not impress the mind as it should. Let us seek a more striking illustration. The smallest and simplest complete musical idea is the single Anglican chant, which contains but ten essential notes, and these may be all alike, as in the celebrated chant of Clang-Chang-Foo:

or nearly all alike, as in the admired example—

or even all different, as in the following exceptional case—

Now how many such chants, think you, would it be possible to compose? Before answering hastily, just consider the limitations. Each of the ten notes may be almost any note of the key, the last, however, must be the key-note and the last but one anything but the 4th or 5th of the scale (these being unavailable as cadences); a few progressions among the other notes, too, will have to be barred, as being unmelodious, but not many. If you attempt to calculate this out you will find the figures mount up in the most surprising way. The first note, for instance, being any note of the scale, and the second also, the combinations of the two are 49, and of the first three notes (deducting a few unmelodious results), 340. The simple phrase of four notes, therefore, forming the first half of a single chant may take upwards of 4,000 forms, while the number of possible complete chants, differing in at least one note, is over sixty millions! Think of it! Our next door neighbour, who spends four hours every Sunday in tormenting our nerves by grinding out chants on his harmonium, would only just be able to get through the entire collection if he played steadily along to the end of his unnatural life. Printing them at six to the page, in books of 500 pages, they would form a library of twenty thousand volumes, such as would break down the walls and floors of his villainous little villa. Now if there are so many possible chants as this, and we allow that only one in a hundred of these is really good—surely a modest estimate—we have still a possible repertory of six hundred thousand beyond the few hundreds already in existence. And if this is true of single chants, it is sixty million times more true of double chants and, à fortiori, of larger compositions to an absolutely overwhelming extent. And we have here only considered the bare bones of melody, not regarding the multitudinous differences formed by passing and auxiliary notes, harmonies and rhythmical accentuation. It is surely obvious, then, that the raw material of music—that is, the phrases which may be invented—is practically inexhaustible, and when you also consider that composers as rarely trouble to invent new phrases as do poets to coin new expressions, but prefer to exercise their art in combining and building up existing material into endless new designs—considering all this, we say, the vastness of music's domain becomes almost awe-inspiring. So, young composer, the next time you get disheartened over the unoriginality of your latest ballad and feel tempted to believe that all the good ballads have already been composed, remember that if every human being in the world had done nothing but write ballads from the creation of the world until to-day, they would not have exhausted the possibilities of even that one limited form. And if only one in a million of these productions had been what we should consider interesting, still all the libraries now existing could not contain a tenth part of them. You can check this calculation during the holidays if you like.

A recent number of the Lancet contains a letter, signed "M.R.C.S. Eng.," which is likely to be useful to so many of our readers that we quote the greater part of it:—

Sirs,—It may, perhaps, be worth recording how I have overcome the weakness of the ring finger, since, being anxious to make myself an accomplished pianist, I set myself to work with the aid of my anatomical knowledge to try to remedy the defect, and with perfect success. I am thoroughly convinced that the defect is not a mechanical one to begin with, but a physiological one—that is to say, that it is not due to the connection of the extensor tendon with that of the little finger, and sometimes also middle finger, but to want of development of the muscles acting upon the ring finger through want of use in early life, so that it thus falls a long way behind the other fingers, not excepting the little finger, in strength. What is required, therefore, is some gymnastic training, and for this purpose there is nothing so useful as an ordinary table napkin ring about an inch in diameter. The ring must be gripped between, first, the little and ring fingers as hard as possible almost, whilst at the same time it is twiddled about between the two fingers by raising one and depressing the other alternately. In this way the interossei muscles are put into action and developed. At first it will be difficult and painful and soon produce cramp in the inter-metacarpal space, and the ring should then be transferred to between the ring and middle fingers, after which it may be placed between the middle and index fingers and the action repeated; but for some time the exercise between the two latter fingers should be only of short duration, until it is felt that the grip between the ring and little fingers is as great as between the other fingers, for the great object is to make all the interossei about equally strong. At the same time the ring may be twiddled after placing it flat on the table between the thumb and index finger in various ways, in order, first, to practise the action of doubling the thumb under the palm, so necessary in scale passages; and, secondly, to practise the action of abducting the index finger by pressing and rotating the ring firmly between the palmar surface of the thumb and the side of the index finger whilst strongly flexed. I may further state that an immense gain in facility of execution can be obtained by those possessed of comparatively short fingers by gradually stretching the web between the fingers, for this is very often one of the great obstacles to the stretching of the fingers far apart. . . . All that is wanted is a flat piece of wood about three-quarters of an inch wide—the handles of a good many brushes may be found to be just the thing—with rounded edges, which is then firmly pressed and see-sawed, as it were, between two adjacent fingers with the object of trying to drag the skin on the insides of the fingers down towards the web alternately. Care must be taken, however, not to press too hard, for I have several imes rubbed a little bit of skin clean out.

Probably some who read these lines may feel inclined to make the experiments they recommend, and, further, to communicate the results to the Editor of this journal.

The Chicago Newberry Library has purchased nearly 3,000 volumes of sacred music collected by Mr. Hubert C. Main. They include English hymn books and pointed psalters, old singing books from The Hague, from Switzerland, and from Germany, together with a comprehensive collection of early New England publications of sacred song. It is in these last-named that interest chiefly concentrates. The dates on the title-pages range from 1711 to the present day, modern examples being extensively represented. While many of the books are worn with age and use, they are in excellent preservation and a source of interest to musician and antiquary alike. In this collection is "The Continental Harmony," containing a number of anthems, fugues, and choruses in several parts, compiled by William Billings in 1794. Possibly not from purely unselfish motives, Mr. Billings laments in a foot-note the niggardliness which prevents people buying a hymn book of their own instead of depending on the clerk or deacon to read to them line by line. He plainly asserts that under existing conditions the deacons appear to have a monopoly of learning, and are the only people who know how to read. This last forcible imputation may not have been without effect, for Mr. Billings's book reached a number of editions. The book opens with a dialogue between master and pupil, in which Mr. Billings enlivens the dry principles of other people's invention with some anecdotes of his own. After quoting the Italian proverb, "God loves not them who love not music," he tells of a Quakeress who regarded the art as a worldly pastime. Nevertheless she allowed her two nieces to attend his singing school and came herself, as she expressed it, "to see the girls safe home." "And what is most diverting," chronicles Mr. Billings, "is that she always came an hour before school broke up, and that was, as she said, to be there in season, but her pretensions were so thin they were easily seen through, for if I am not much out of my conjectures she was as highly entertained as any of the audience. Yet," he concludes, testily, "this woman would never acknowledge that music was any gratification to her."

The approaching month will bring with it one of the most important musical events of the year—the Birmingham Musical Festival. This will take place on October 2, 3, 4, and 5. The great Oratorio—the production of which in 1846 gave this Festival its brightest lustre of distinction—will appropriately open the function; in the evening Berlioz's Te Deum, with Brahms's Symphony, No. 2, and other pieces will be given. Wednesday will, no doubt, be the day to which the interest of musicians will specially be directed, as it will witness the production in the morning of a new Oratorio, "King Saul," composed expressly for the Festival by Dr. Hubert Parry. The artists engaged for this work are Miss Anna Williams, Miss Marie Brema, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Andrew Black, and Mr. Henschel. In the evening a Cantata by the late Goring Thomas will be presented for the first time. It is entitled "The Swan and the Skylark," and has been scored for orchestra by Professor Stanford. Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture and the "Hymn of Praise" will complete this Concert. On Thursday morning "The Messiah" will be given; and in the evening Mr. Henschel's "Stabat Mater" will be produced, associated with Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and other works. Cherubini's Mass in D minor will be performed on Friday morning, with Palestrina's "Stabat Mater," the Good Friday music from "Parsifal," and Mozart's E flat Symphony; and the concluding programme in the evening will inculde Schumann's "Faust" and Beethoven's Choral Symphony—a fitting termination. Besides the artists already named, Madame Albani, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Iver McKay, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, Mr. Brereton, and Mr. Eugene Oudin are engaged.

Sacred and profane writers are in agreement as to the harmony which prevailed among the early Christians when they were few in numbers, and were a contemned and persecuted community, even their worst foes being fain to exclaim "See how these Christians love one another!" But when the Church became rich and powerful unity gave way to schism and heresy, and all sorts of opposing sects sprang up, doing infinite damage to the cause which all professed to have at heart. History is wont to repeat itself, and an example occurs in the various relationships of the devotees of Richard Wagner. When the name of the Bayreuth poet-composer could not be uttered without a sneer, or words of the utmost opprobrium, his scanty followers stuck shoulder to shoulder, and in fact constituted themselves a kind of mutual admiration society. But victory has crowned their efforts all along the line. Wagner spells money to all who deal with him judiciously, either in the opera-house or the concert-room. If reports from the Continent may be trusted, this state of things is by no means an unmixed blessing. A coolness has sprung up, it is said, even between those twin strongholds of the new faith, Bayreuth and Munich. The authorities in the first-named place are by no means well pleased that a rival series of performances should be given in the Bavarian capital, running concurrently with those at Bayreuth, and at prices more within the means of ordinary amateurs. This feeling of soreness has been accentuated by reports confidently made that in some respects the Munich performances were superior to those in the Franconian head-centre. Then those Germans who are hopelessly possessed by a spirit of Chauvinism have been loud in their denunciation of the engagement of English-speaking artists, and here again fuel has been added to the flame by the opinions of impartial critics as to the vocal superiority of Mesdames Nordica and Marie Brema over the majority of the Teutonic artists. Other smouldering fires might be indicated, but enough has been said to show if, according to Shakespeare, "Sweet are the uses of adversity," so occasionally it might be said in antithesis, "Bitter are the results of prosperity."

Wherein, if anywhere, lies the vaunted superiority of the Bayreuth performances? This question is frequently put, and not without a show of reason, in view of the fact that in many respects other opera-houses may claim equality, if not even superiority. Thus Covent Garden can boast of artists of higher vocal attainments, and Mr. Irving has presented us with scenic effects quite as near to perfection as any of the beautiful pictures in "Parsifal" or "Tannhäuser." Nowhere, however, is the ensemble so perfect; in no other theatre is each detail so cared for, and, be it remembered, in no other theatre are the conditions for witnessing a performance so favourable. The darkened auditorium and the hidden orchestra make it possible to concentrate the attention on the drama and to ignore the machinery to an extent impossible elsewhere. Bayreuth has also a use that must not be forgotten. It keeps the chief German opera-houses up to concert-pitch. The result of putting upon the Bayreuth stage Wagner's earlier operas has been that other theatres have been led by a spirit of emulation to refurbish their representations of these works. The amicable rivalry of Dresden, Berlin, and Munich with Bayreuth can only have good results in raising the standard of the performance of the Wagnerian music-dramas, at any rate on the German stage. At Munich, for instance, where the citizens have long enough regretted their deafness to Wagner's proposal to found his model theatre on the banks of the Isar, a cycle of Wagner's works has been given as a supplement to the Bayreuth Festival, and rendered with a completeness due indirectly to Bayreuth. This shows that the Festspielhaus has its mission, quite apart from its present monopoly in "Parsifal," a monopoly, by the way, which most of those who have witnessed this mystery-drama must wish should continue.

The novelty of the Festival was, of course, "Lohengrin," which had never before been mounted at Bayreuth. The policy of reviving such popular works as "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin" at Bayreuth is defensible by the very reason of their popularity. Just as the popularity of Handel's "Messiah" has made it suffer in performance through an accumulation of bad traditions, so these early operas are in danger of suffering from the carelessness which familiarity begets. In England especially has "Lohengrin" been maltreated by the numerous cuts to which it has been subjected. The gradual growth of distrust in Elsa's mind is so much more clearly depicted when the work is given in its entirety that it is to be regretted the conditions of theatre-going in London seem to make it impossible to perform "Lohengrin" according to the composer's intentions. "Lohengrin" is, in most respects, so admirably produced on the chief German stages that there was perhaps less marked superiority in the Bayreuth performance than is the case with any other Wagnerian work. In respect of the hidden orchestra and the perfect arrangements of the auditorium, Bayreuth, however, stands quite alone, so that, solely on this account, the pains expended in journeying to the Franconian capital to witness even this familiar work are not lost. Indeed, the absolute artistic success of Wagner's theatre makes it a matter for surprise that it has not been the model for others of the kind. In England the question of finance of course stands in the way, for the seating arrangements are far from profitable, save under extraordinary circumstances.

Some of the lessons to be learned from the experiences of the recent opera season were discussed at length in our last number, but there is another to which attention may be briefly directed. Time was when managers were content to place trust upon a stale repertory and upon artists some of whom lagged superfluous on the stage. Sir Augustus Harris, in his late enterprise, flew to the opposite extreme, and produced novelties in such quick succession that no time was given to assimilate them properly, and there would be every excuse for his aristocratic subscribers if they mixed up "Manon Lescaut" and "Werther," "La Navarraise" and "L'Attaque du Moulin," "Signa" and "The Lady of Longford." This, however, was by no means the greatest of possible evils. Only by many performances can it be ascertained whether the English public, always reserved in attitude towards that which is new, is likely to take any fresh work of magnitude into permanent regard, and when one novelty is produced only to be thrust aside in order to make room for another, the needful test cannot be enforced. As to the strain involved upon all concerned in carrying out the decrees of the too enterprising impresario, no frequenter of Covent Garden could fail to note its disastrous effects. Wearied with never-ceasing rehearsals during the day, the performers came to their duties at night in no fit condition to render justice even to the most familiar operas, and slovenliness sometimes reigned supreme from the supers at the back of the stage to the orchestra in front of the footlights. Sir Augustus Harris, who has done so much to revivify lyric drama in this country, may be earnestly counselled to adopt a more moderate policy next season. There are other examples of the new blood-and-thunder school of opera, in which the apparent aim of all concerned is to break as many of the Commandments as possible, from which he might make selections; but if he is wise he will hold his hand for a time, and labour rather to secure more excellence in ensemble than was possible during his last season.

A CERTAIN firm of organ builders recently proposed that they should supply an organ for a new church. This was the reply:—

Dear Sirs,—Yours of July 8 at hand. I would first say we do not desire a pipe organ in our new church; we have no place for one. We are not quite ready to sell our birthright to heaven yet. We are commanded to make melody in our hearts to the Lord, not on pipe organs, or horns, or fiddles. There is more glory to God in the music of a splinter on an old rail caused by the wind that God causes to blow than there is on ten thousand pipe organs. God is sore displeased with manufactured wind worship. Read Amos vi. 1-6; Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16. God bless you! I hope you will give this matter some serious thought in the light of Jesus and the Judgment. If you do, God will lead you out of the business.

One would like to ask the writer of this epistle a few questions. For instance: the "heart" being here opposed to organs, horns, and fiddles, it is obvious the term is used in its literal, physical sense. Now, how do you make melody, in the literal sense, in a heart? If the writer knows that "to make melody in our hearts" is a figurative expression, why does he juggle with the phrase for the purpose of making it mean what it does not mean? If, on the other hand, he does not know that it is a figure of speech, then he is a very ignorant person, and in that case his assumption of the right to teach others would be ludicrous, as well as impertinent. Again, "the music of a splinter on an old rail caused by the wind," is nonsense. "Music" is a fine art, and as such must be made by mankind. The sounds of Nature are often very pleasant, but to call them "music" (except in a figurative sense) is—we repeat the expression—to juggle with words. If the writer really thinks that the sound of the wind against a splinter of wood is a nobler manifestation of Divine Wisdom than the sound of that King among instruments which "God's good handiwork, the man He made, hath made," his mental condition must indeed be pitiable.

THE British Museum has just had the good luck to add an important acquisition to its large collection of valuable printed music. At a recent sale there turned up a copy of the sixth book printed by Ottaviano Petrucci, the celebrated printer of Venice and Fossombrone, a book so rare that hitherto only an imperfect copy of it had been known to exist. As the sale in which it occurred was not one that attracted the attention of many collectors of old music, the Museum succeeded in acquiring the book at no very exorbitant price, and it is now added to the goodly array of Petruccis which the national collection already possessed. The work in question is entitled as follows: "Motetti De passione De cruce De sacramento De beata virgine et huiusmodi. B.," and the imprint is dated at Venice, on May 10, 1503. Both Anton Schmid (the biographer of Petrucci) and Ambros only knew the book by name, and even its correct title was a matter of conjecture until the discovery of the Museum copy. It was first described in the Monatshefte für Musik-Geschichte for 1873, by Dr. F. X. Haberl, the learned editor of Palestrina, who found an incomplete copy in the Library of the Liceo Musicale at Bologna. Unfortunately, this copy—a description of which is given in Vol. II., p. 344, of Gaspari and Parisini's Catalogue—wants two leaves. By analogy with Petrucci's first collection of motets, of which it forms a continuation, Dr. Haberl conjectured that the title ran "Motetti. B. Numero trentatre. B.," but this is now known to be incorrect, the real title of the work being in the form already given. The book is an exceedingly fine specimen of Petrucci's typography, and is peculiar owing to all the parts of which the music consists being printed on opposite pages, instead of, as was usually done, in separate part-books.

THE Rev. H. T. Armfield, Rural Dean of Halstead, Essex, asks us to quote a letter from his pen which appeared recently in the Essex County Chronicle. We do so with pleasure, and heartily commend its contents to all who are interested in the spread of musical culture:—

Sir,—It will interest many people in the county to know that on the motion of an esteemed lay member of our body, and without a dissentient voice, the Technical Education Committee for the Halstead district have lately resolved that it would be both popular and useful to add vocal and instrumental music to the schedule of subjects issued by the Technical Committee of the Essex County Council. At one time it was fairly questioned whether the subject came within the terms of the Act. That doubt, however, seems to be now removed by the fact that some three or four County Councils in the North actually have the subject in their lists. What they can do in the North, we can do in Essex. If this were done here we should soon have the unjust reproach rolled away that the Essex man has no powers in music. He has the same powers as anyone else; but he has never had the chance, and therefore he has no traditions. About here the young fellows are simply wild after it. And the results are really surprising. In this village we had last winter a singing class taught by a lady. They began with thirty-five and increased to about fifty—exclusively from the rural population. But at the end of the season they sang to me two modern four-part songs quite unaccompanied. They made, of course, precisely the mistakes which a musician would have expected, but they carried it through to the end and came out well in pitch. Nor are the moral and social effects to be ignored. Lately a young ploughman began to study instrumental music under my auspices, and after ten or twelve weeks his master told me that the civilising effect upon him was remarkable; that he was quite changed, and that they found the change in him when he was in the furrow about his work.

A NEW YORK contemporary expresses surprise that in an English musical magazine Brahms's beautiful variations for orchestra on Haydn's "Chorale St. Antoni" should have been spoken of as a "weariness to the flesh," and comments as follows: "Well, well! the British music-writers are getting along, but it's slow work, my masters, slow work. Some day they will reach Tschaikowski, and then look out for trouble." For the information of American musicians and journalists generally we make this an opportunity for saying that as all English musicians and critics of standing have long ago recognised the genius of Brahms (this does not mean that he is fanatically worshipped or that his faults are ignored), it is considered a sign of independence by a certain small clique of writers in this country to systematically attack that composer whenever it is possible to do so. The underlying principle is the same that actuated the Irish gentleman, who, in reply to a question regarding his politics, said, "I'm agin the Government." There is also the consideration that far more notoriety is to be obtained by attacking than by praising what the world agrees to honour. Thus, for example, had our English contemporary's contributor praised the variations in question no notice of the fact would have been taken. He sneered at them, and the result is a paragraph mentioning the name of the journal in a New York paper. The advertisement is obviously cheap at the price.

It is proposed to erect in New York a memorial to the poet Heine. The project emanates from the "Heinebund," a singing club which has been established in the American capital since 1869. The memorial is to take the form of a fountain, surmounted by a figure of the Loreley and bearing on the pedestal a medallion of the poet in profile. The work was intended for Düsseldorf, where Heine was born; but the municipality having refused (on account of Heine's radical tendencies (!) and irregular life) to sanction its erection there, the sculptor, Mr. Ernest Herter, has offered to present it to the City of New York. The Heinebund will give a grand Concert next month in aid of the fund. The scheme has our cordial good wishes, but all the same there is not the least need of a monument for Heine—he has already an imperishable one in the countless settings of his poems by musicians of every nation. While the songs of Schubert, Schumann, and Liszt (to name only these) find singers there is no fear that the memory of Heine will fade. And as regards Düsseldorf—Heine belongs to Europe. Düsseldorf is merely an unfortunate accident in this connection.

A CHANGE OF AIR.

In August—London then is not
A wonderfully bracing spot,
But usually rather hot—
The most preoccupying care
Of matron, maid, and man, you know,
Of masher, merchant, medico,
Of money-lender, high or low,
Is just to seek a change of air.

So he who has to sing or play,
And study music day by day,
Determines he will go away
For some refreshing change of air.
He wakes. What music is at hand,
The plash of waves on stones or sand?
Oh, no; a cheerful German band.
Mascagni dogs him even there.

He rises. While he neatly shaves,
He still can hear no plash of waves,
Some new, nomadic, noisy knaves
Play "Di, Di, Di"—his words are blank.
He brushes hair, a little long,
To strains of some such "comic" song.
He breakfasts. Still performers throng,
And play "The Man that broke the Bank."

He strolls by waves described as sad;
What wonder if they are, when bad,
Bold, blatant brigands grind like mad
That "Bicycle" they "made for Two"?
He cannot loiter by the sea,
Resembling Lucy. How can he,
If niggers force him still to flee,
By singing "Linger longer Loo"?

He bathes. The sea is rough; to cope
With cresting waves he holds a rope,
But loses this, his only hope,
When sounds "The Lost Chord" from afar,
So mad is he. With mournful mien,
He struggles back to his machine;
A cornet solo in between
Is played—"'E dunno where 'e are."

He lunches, wishing he could hang
The brutes who blow, the beasts who bang;
What bygone boys once blithely sang,
"Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay" recalls.
He plays at tennis; balls behind
A quickset hedge he has to find,
While Southern bandits blandly grind
That air which tells of "After Balls."

He dines; he smokes by moonlit sea.
Perhaps he flirts, why should not he?
Musicians are but men, you see.
"O Liza!" wakes the silent deep.
He hastens home; to bed he'll go.
But Morpheus mocks his restless woe;
They're strumming in the room below
"The Garden"—hang it all!—"of Sleep.'

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

"All things die," sang the poet, to which may be added "even nigger minstrelsy." However startling, it is a fact that the black-visaged itinerants are rapidly ceasing to be the favourite discoursers of discord at our seaside holiday resorts. Bands of Pierrots, with whitened faces, clad in the conventional redundant garments and armed with violins and mandolines, have gained so much popularity that, as in a larger field, the white men threaten to exterminate the black. There is room in this change for congratulation. The dress is certainly more artistic than the absurd and aggressive costume of the niggers; and the mandolines, with their shivery and querulous tones, are far more acceptable than the assertive twang of the banjo, the snap of the cannibalistic bones, and the thud and jingle of the tambourine. Here, however, satisfaction ends. The black man may become white, but, to parody a well-known line, "the scent of the bones will cling to him still," and in spite of his powder and lavish display of laundry, he still continues to sing of the drivelling idiotcies of the drunken man or the vagaries of the vacant mind. There is, however, one gleam of hope. If the seaside entertainer finds the more artistic dress pay better, it may dawn on him—during the next century or so—that a more rational song, which should contain a modicum of wit, might also cause a still further relaxation of public purse-strings. We all know what Carlyle has written concerning the mighty influence of clothes, and St. Cecilia was, after all, a woman, and so perchance may be successfully wooed, even by the whitened black man.

Discussing the attempt made by Ambros to define "the boundaries of music and poetry," an American reviewer remarks:—

But why should any attempt be made to define the boundaries of the illimitable? Who can say what is impossible, either in music or poetry? In physics alone, in these times of high mental activity, almost every day proofs are advanced that things which have universally been deemed contrary to all experience are, nevertheless, true. . . . Possibly to Æschylus and Sophocles the Shakespearian comedy, if described ever so marvellously well, might appear artistically impossible; and to Pythagoras and Aristotle, say, Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" would be simply unthinkable. To us, both are accomplished facts; and we do not greatly care whether the play be given as a prologue illustrating the music, or if the music be first rendered as an introduction illustrating the play. For we regard the Shakespearian comedy and the Symphonic Poem in many particulars as precisely analogous. Both are plays; one with, and one without words. . . . In both we move from scene to scene, from dream to dream; and there is apparently no limit to illusion. In neither are we held chained to common sense or the final Q. E. D. We do not want the "Ghost" in "Hamlet" put under a lime light in the centre of the stage, nor so to label every phrase in music that nothing is left to the imagination; but would rather barely see the apparition, and but dimly descry the illusions of the symphonist; for it is the illusion in either case that delights. Realities are frequently tiresome enough in this most prosaic nineteenth century; and so much so that it is most refreshing to find ourselves emancipated from rigorous logic, and roaming in a sort of dreamland, making romantic adventures and experiencing the childish delight akin to that first felt in the nursery when fairy tales were read.

Those who complain of certain operas (Wagner's, for instance) because the music interferes with the progress of the action—renders the work "undramatic," as they are fond of putting it—may profitably weigh the following by the same writer:—

When the feelings are enlisted in the Shakespearian comedy (say, "As You Like It") . . . we are not so fastidious respecting the hurrying forward of the plot; and similarly, when the soul is made to soar on a beautiful melody in a truly grand opera, we are equally desirous to give it time to unfold and spread itself (in extenso), however much the action may be impeded. It seems therefore to matter little whether one dreams on, carried with the tide of poetic emotions or the purely musical ones. Still less, if able to pass an examination respecting the boundaries of either, and prove that there is or is not an overlapping.

The fact is that a dramatic representation approaches so much nearer to an imitation of real life than any other art, that unthinking persons fly to the conclusion that this imitation is the end of the drama, whereas, of course, it is merely one of the means by which the drama effects its purpose—that of elevating, interesting, moving, and amusing the spectator.

Musical criticism in San Francisco is not everything that it should be, if we are to credit the following from The Wasp, a weekly paper of that city. Says that lively print:—

It is of no use to conceal the fact that criticism in San Francisco is in a rather primitive state, because proper importance is not given to it by our local newspapers. It is pretty well known that our musical critics, for one reason or other, are not persons adapted to their vocation. Criticisms, or rather musical reviews, are generally written only in a business-like manner to make the paper more attractive for a certain class of people; consequently insufficient to help the development of the public taste. Some are inspired by the false method of praising everybody, encouraging wretched mediocrities and protecting offensive charlatans. . . . Others are the means of advertisement to the writer, often a common and unsuccessful musician. Very few people have the patience to read those conglomerations of nonsense, without head or tail, and usually written in vile English. The persons employed as critics by such papers (daily and weekly) are utterly incapable pianists, would-be composers, vulgar pedants, and pretentious puppets who are in need of having their names constantly before the public in order to obtain that importance which their musical ability fails to secure. Hence they pompously sign their scribblings.

The last sentence is interesting, for we have been told of late, with some insistence, that if only critics signed their articles they would be loved by everybody. But then, of course, human nature is different in San Francisco.

Madame Melba has been interviewed on the training of singers. Among a number of quite exceptionally sensible things she said:—

No voice should be trained before the sixteenth year. Up to that time the girl can study, get the rudiments of a general education. Then I should advise the girl to go to Paris and go to work. Voice culture is slow. The organ is too delicate to be forced or overworked. The musical training will leave plenty of time for the study of language, musical history, poetry, and physical culture. I consider the stage indispensable to the young student. She should see and hear all the operas, concerts, and comedies possible. . . . I am not partial to a so-called musical education. In no profession is general intelligence more essential. There are many successful singers with positively ugly voices; but the singers are smart; their phrasing is good; they have good methods; they know how to act, and they bring the charm of health, taste, and personal refinement to bear upon the audience. That is what I mean by being essentially intelligent. . . . Too much stress is laid upon the term "beauty." It is a mistake. The word is misleading. Better results would accrue if young people tried to be healthy. Perfect health is absolutely necessary to the singer. Perfect health is personal attractiveness. Next to heredity, diet is the most important factor in health. I am well because I don't abuse my stomach. I know exactly the foods and drinks that agree with me, and I don't touch anything else. . . . To lay down a regimen for singers would be absurd. Each individual must work out her own health problem. I sing on a basin of soup or a dish of raw oysters. After the opera I have a hot dinner.

The organist of a church not ten miles from Boston (U.S.A.) was recently called before the music committee for reprimand, and this, according to the Musical Courier, was the conversation that took place: "We don't doubt," said the spokesman, "that you know your business and can handle an organ; but to tell the truth we think—have thought for some time along back—that your pieces are too much like the opéry (with the accent on the second syllable), and seems to us the house of the Lord ain't exactly the place for opéry music." "Do you mean that my selections are too operatic?" asked the amazed organist. "Well, yes, that's about it. Now, for example, that solo Miss —— sang last Sunday morning—way up, then way down—that's the kind of music we object to in the house of the Lord." "Last Sunday! Miss ——'s solo!" answered the organist, thinking back. "But, my dear sirs, that was 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.'" "Well, we don't know anything about that, but what we'd like is some good hymn tunes. A good rousing opening piece like 'Hold the Fort' we don't object to; but the opéry music, as we said before, we don't feel satisfied with it."

Chicago, we learn, is to have a new musical organisation—the "Marine Band"—which "is to be composed of the best material obtainable. It will be an auxiliary to the First Battalion of the Illinois Naval Militia. The novelty of the idea is that the band will be quartered the entire year on the model battleship Illinois, which is to be removed to an accessible spot on the lake front." On this vessel Promenade Concerts will be given and "no effort will be spared to make the band one of the most artistic organisations of the country." Very good, so far; but the next sentence reveals the chief attraction:—

Original features are to be introduced that will spice the Concerts with an alluring sensationalism. Bombs will be used instead of cannon for bass accompaniments, a set of twelve chimes is ranged along the breakwater, a gatling gun will be used in military pieces, and fifty flash torches will produce the fire effect.

We discern here the dawn of a new branch of managerial activity—the spicing of Concerts with alluring sensationalisms. It is indeed obvious that in the near future entrepreneurs will find the services of a really capable and gifted "Concert spicer" absolutely indispensable.

The English order of knighthood is a sore trouble to your foreign journalist. Our French contemporaries in particular exhibit a quite desperate combination of irritation and ingenuity when compelled to refer by name to any Englishman with a title. The fact is sufficiently extraordinary and amusing. But still more so is the discovery that our American cousins—or, at any rate, some of them—are as foggy on the subject as the Ménéstrel itself. The New York Musical Courier manages, in a recent issue, to refer to "our only impresario" as "Sir Augustus Harris" and "Mr. Harris" within the space of five lines; and another well known American musical journal speaks of the same gentleman as "Sir Harris"! The worthy knight in question recently explained the Parisian avoidance of his Christian name as a result of French politeness. "They think that 'Sir Augustus' would be unduly familiar," said he. But this, however plausible in the case of France, will obviously not fit America. Whatever the American journalist's faults may be, fear of the "unduly familiar" is not one of them.

It is pleasant to note from time to time the improvements being made in the local musical arrangements at our holiday resorts. The original brass "Town Band," the satisfactory performances of which are impeded by the necessity of some part of the harmony being always "collecting," is gradually retiring to the back streets and giving place on the piers and band stands to well organised and competent orchestras. Foremost in the van of musical progress in this particular is Eastbourne, where, at the popular Devonshire Park, excellent performances are being given, under the able direction of Mr. Norfolk Megone. During the past month the works performed have included Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and "Leonora" Overture; Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and his G minor Pianoforte Concerto; Wagner's "Rienzi" and "Tannhäuser" Overtures; and an excellent selection of high-class light music. May the success which has attended these Concerts induce other holiday centres to go and do likewise.

The programme of the four musical Recitals given during the past month at Edinburgh, under the title of the "Summer meeting," were of more than usual interest. Two were devoted to "German song writers of the nineteenth century" and two were made up of examples of "Music of the Keltic nations," the latter including an admirable selection of Breton, Cornish, Irish, Welsh, Manx, and Scottish folk-songs. The list of executants included Mr. Tobias Matthay and many other well-known names, and the whole scheme reflects great credit on Mr. Kennedy-Fraser, under whose management the Concerts were given.

The Globe has apparently less belief in the endurance of steel, iron, copper, wood, and ivory than in that of human nerves and muscles. Commenting recently on the report that a Milanese pianist had played for twenty-five consecutive hours without abnormal fatigue, our esteemed contemporary remarks: "He is said to have been quite fresh at the end of the performance, but the poor piano must have been a shattered wreck" (!). Fortunately the manufacturer of the instrument is not named, otherwise such an implication of fragility would certainly have led to an action for damages. The punishment of the modern pianoforte is often greater than its hearers can bear with equanimity, but the instrument generally comes up smiling.

We are assured by an emerald-hued contemporary that a Berlin house has hit upon the idea of selling music by weight. Songs cost two-and-a-half marks per kilo; pianoforte music is a little dearer, and for a kilo of Symphonies no less than four marks is asked. It is not stated whether the goods are sold quâ music or quâ waste paper; but as the prices quoted are too low for the former and too high for the latter, we may assume that they are offered as a combination of both, which is original. The system has much to recommend it. Works that are dry or that have been weighed in the balance and found wanting should always be sold by weight in fairness to the unfortunate purchaser.

As a matter of course, Alboni anecdotes have been freely circulated lately in Paris. Here is one. A young contralto, with plenty of confidence and a decided tendency to embonpoint, sang before Alboni at one of Rossini's soirées. The great vocalist (at that time of enormous girth) was very complimentary. "Eh! Mademoiselle, you will equal me soon," said she. "Well, I hope so!" was the reply. And then she came down; for Alboni added, with seeming concern, "God preserve you from it; it is very annoying. I know something about it, and I warn you to take care of yourself."

A lady in the South of London who teaches the pianoforte announces—so the Daily Telegraph tells us—that she gives "two lessons for ninepence." Referring to the matter our contemporary speaks of the lady's fee as amounting to "fourpence half-penny a lesson." But we hope it is not so bad as that. Seeing that the purchaser of two articles of the same nature generally gives less than double the price of one, we think it justifiable to assume that the lady in question would ask probably as much as sixpence for a single lesson. But there!—even at fourpence halfpenny the lessons may be dear!

It is immaterial whether the conversation took place at Chicago or at Covent Garden, but it was overheard:—

Mrs. Newgold (at Box Office): Are Opera tickets on sale here?

Clerk: Yes, Madam. Do you require them for any particular date?

Mrs. N.: Well, what night do Lohengrin and Carmen sing together?

"The Grand Old Robber" is avenged, and the avenger is that printer's boy! The Winnipeg Daily Tribune devotes nearly fifty lines to the now famous indictment, and thrice refers to the lecturer as "Mr. Ebenezer Trout" (!) The imp may be congratulated (it is holiday time) on having landed so big a fish. "Mr. Trout" might next try a dip into Bach for a change.

Composers, it is well known, sometimes write hard things of critics. A recent attack of the kind is thus described in a Californian paper:—

"Composer Kelley has been devastating some valuable space in the Examiner lately by sloshing around as a critic of critics. His attitude has been that of a musical cowboy, so to speak, lassoing the wild steers of melody and flopping them on their ungainly backs, while he dismounts from his high horse and twists their tails and ties their kicking extremities.

"Sloshing around" is real elegant, and, to us at least, quite new.

Anecdotes of M. Pachmann have been sorely missed of late. Here is one that we do not remember to have seen before. Someone told Pachmann that he was generally supposed to be of Hebraic descent. "Non!" said he, proudly; "my father was a Cantor at Odessa, but my mother was a Turkey. I am a pianist."

According to the Irish Ecclesiastical Gazette, the following conversation between an English lady visiting the Parish Church in the South of Ireland and the Sexton:—

Lady.—Have you Matins here every day?

Sexton.—Oh, no, indeed ma'am, we couldn't afford it! But I lay down a cocoa-nut mattin' every Sunday morning.

Two ancient bronze Lures have lately been found near Nykjöbing (Isle of Falster, Denmark), at a depth of twenty-eight inches below the ground. They resemble in almost every detail the specimens in the famous collection of Lures in the Copenhagen National Museum.

According to the Rugby Advertiser someone there recently sang a solo from the "Daughters of Darius." Is it not time that boy took a holiday?

CHESTER FESTIVAL.

(By our own Correspondent.)

The ancient city on the Dee, famous of old for religious festivities, had an excellent "Music Meeting" in the week beginning July 22. Everybody now knows that a Chester Festival was established in 1772 and continued till 1829, when the celebrations were discontinued, to be resumed exactly half-a-century later. But a curious fact may not be so familiar, and a curious fact it is that the occurrence of the first series of meetings was not in the mind of the promoters of the present series when they took action. I shall not be far wrong in saying that the doings from 1772 to 1829 were actually unknown to the organist and precentor when, after a visit to York on the occasion of a Festival performance in the Minster, they asked each other why something of the same kind should not be wrought out in Chester, and straightway put the matter to a practical test. The present institution is therefore, in its origin, wholly independent of the past, which did not even suggest it.

The arrangements for the late meeting were very complete and singularly efficient. I have never known a Festival on the same scale better equipped as regards executants; the orchestra consisting for the most part of performers drawn from Sir Charles Hallé's band, Mr. Willy Hess at their head, while the chorus, apart from a limited number of local singers, was brought from various towns in Yorkshire. It is scarcely needful to add that both bodies gave entire satisfaction, or that they kept the music throughout the week at the high level proper to such an occasion. Of solo vocalists there was no stint; the engagements including Mesdames Anna Williams, Antoinette Trebelli, Fanny Moody, Marian McKenzie, and Clara Butt; Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Iver McKay, Andrew Black, and Bantock Pierpoint. Mr. J. T. Hughes presided at an organ provided by Messrs. Gray and Davison, who sent the instrument specially erected in Westminster Abbey for the Royal Jubilee, and the Conductor was, of course, Dr. Joseph C. Bridge.

The proceedings began, as is the Chester rule, with a special Service in the Cathedral Nave, at which the Bishop was preacher; the music, which included Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," being rendered by the full orchestra and chorus, with Miss Anna Williams and Mr. McKay as principal soloists. The "Lobgesang" had a masterful rendering at this Service, the greater choruses being given with magnificent effect in the resonant church, and the symphonic movements, the second and third more especially, producing an impression which the congregation could hardly refrain from making known by means which the sacred character of the place prohibited. There was an immense gathering; many persons coming from Liverpool and other towns to help in crowding the Cathedral. Monday and Tuesday, as is the wise custom at Chester, were devoted to rehearsals; the Festival proper beginning on Wednesday morning with "Elijah." Once more Mendelssohn's dramatic Oratorio drew a large audience, who listened with religious attention to the well-known strains. I am not, however, called upon to show the same zeal for the familiar, and it will suffice to state that the work was given efficiently. Miss Williams, Madame McKenzie, Mr. McKay, and Mr. Andrew Black were the soloists. Of the last-named it may be said that he sang the arduous part of the Prophet with dignity and dramatic force. The evening programme was full of good things. We had, to begin with, an effective rendering of Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, the "religiousness" of which now passes, on these occasions, without dispute. Then came Mendelssohn's divine hymn "Hear my Prayer," with Miss Fanny Moody as soloist. It may surprise some to be told that Madame Moody made her festival début on this occasion. She was not in the best of health, but her artistic and expressive delivery of Mendelssohn's strains convinced amateurs that she deserves a place among candidates for further honours in such exalted service. After Mr. Willy Hess had played Max Bruch's Adagio Appassionato with charming effect, the pure and, as it seemed, ethereal tone of the violin penetrating to all parts of the Cathedral, Verdi's Manzoni "Requiem" occupied the remainder of the evening. That impressive composition had not previously been heard in Chester, and seemed to come as a revelation alike of the awful and the beautiful in religious music. To discuss the work here for the behoof of musical readers would be impertinence, since they must know it from beginning to end; but I may tell how it enchained the attention of an unaccustomed audience, backed, as it was, by the solemn influences of the locale. The performance, moreover, was one marked not only by general accuracy, but by the special effects always noticeable when executants are engaged in a task about which they are enthusiastic. Miss Trebelli, Madame McKenzie, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Pierpoint gave a good account of the solos, and the entire rendering was one to be looked back upon with pride by those who took part in it.

The second day's proceedings began with a performance of Dr. Hubert Parry's "Judith," the composer conducting, the soloists being those who took part in the "Requiem," save that Miss Butt replaced Madame McKenzie, and two of Mr. Stedman's boys took the part of the young Hebrew Princes. Again I am free from the need of discussing the music, and entitled to dismiss the performance with a few words of deserved commendation. The hero of the occasion was Mr. Lloyd, whose delivery of the somewhat trying music assigned to Manasseh could not have been surpassed for beauty of voice and truth, as well as power of expression. Dr. Parry, there is reason to believe, was quite satisfied with the general interpretation of the music. Certainly every disposition to promote that feeling existed among the executants. Thursday evening saw the Cathedral vacant and the Music Hall filled with an audience prepared for the enjoyment of a change to secular music, and curious, no doubt, regarding the Symphony in F composed for the occasion by Dr. Joseph C. Bridge. The new work turned out to be in six movements, each suggested by an event in the history of Chester. Two of the six movements will probably be removed should the Symphony find its way into our concert-rooms. There would remain the regulation four—first Allegro, Scherzo, slow movement, and Finale—which can be taken as abstract music. The work is pleasing and suggestive. Nothing in it presents a puzzle to the hearer, or causes him to wonder for what high but obscure purpose the composer made sacrifice of musical beauty. As a matter of fact, Dr. Bridge's Symphony makes very agreeable hearing, and, in a shortened form, would stand a fair chance of a metropolitan welcome. With the new work, which won most cordial applause, was associated the "Golden Legend," solos by Miss Trebelli, Madame McKenzie, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Black, and Mr. Ditchburn. Concerning this there is nothing to say.

On the third morning the Cathedral programme included Cherubini's Mass in D minor, Beethoven's Violin Romance in G, Schubert's Symphony in C (No. 9), and a short cantata, "The Soul's Forgiveness," composed by Dr. Sawyer for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra. This work deals in a dramatic form with a subject usually treated in the manner of an anthem, and so far is a creditable endeavour to find out a new path. The music is chiefly remarkable for orchestration, which shows that Dr. Sawyer does not lag behind his time. Much of it is effective, some of it even impressive, and all of it clever. The quasi-Wagnerian declamation given to the solo voice lies open to criticism, but Dr. Sawyer may be congratulated upon another step in advance, and encouraged to proceed. The Festival closed with "The Messiah," which drew an enormous audience and brought the satisfactory doings of the week to a fitting end. Congratulations to Dr. Bridge.

THE BAYREUTH AND MUNICH FESTIVALS.

(From our own Correspondents.)

No art institution is at the present time more firmly fixed in the esteem of the public than the periodic gatherings in the theatre founded by Richard Wagner in the little Franconian town. Year by year when the summons goes forth enthusiasts from all parts of the civilised world respond in ever-increasing numbers. Intended by the poet-composer especially as a glorification of German art, Bayreuth has become more and more cosmopolitan, and were it not for the support accorded by English and American amateurs, the undertaking would surely collapse. This year there are nearly 6,000 English visitors, a number greatly exceeding that of any former occasion. Considering the number of performances of Wagner's works and concert selections therefrom in London at the present time, the increasing desire to visit Bayreuth may appear singular, but it is easily capable of explanation. As the master's music-dramas are now studied with avidity, the glaring defects in their interpretation on this side of the Channel—defects which are, perhaps, to some extent inevitable in the course of a busy opera season—become more and more palpable, and hence the wish to witness them under the conditions laid down by Wagner himself. "Lohengrin," the first production of which at Bayreuth has constituted the principal feature of interest at this year's Festival, has suffered less than "Tannhäuser" from carelessness in preparation and performance; but many directions in the score are coolly ignored, painful anachronisms are apparent in the matters of scenery and costume, and the effect of both music and drama is greatly injured by senseless mutilations. The nearest approach to a really artistic presentment of "Lohengrin" in London was that by the Carl Rosa company at Her Majesty's Theatre rather more than a dozen years ago. But memory is short and a highly creditable production seems to be forgotten. The Bayreuth performance may be regarded from many points of view. Special pains have been taken to ensure archæological accuracy. The period chosen is actually that of Henry the Fowler—that is to say, in the early part of the tenth century—and the difference in detail between the manners and customs of the Brabantians and those of the Saxons are carefully illustrated. The chorus and supers do not remain immobile, but every one is made to act, as instructed by that empress in the art of stage management, Madame Cosima Wagner. Certain points of detail should be mentioned. At the end of the first act, in place of the ordinary tableau, Elsa and Lohengrin are hoisted on shields and borne off in triumph, the rest following in a joyous procession. Then in the last of the splendid series of male choruses in the second act, which, of course, are given in their entirety after the Herald has proclaimed that the newly-arrived Guardian of Brabant will lead all to the war on the morrow, the Saxons and Brabantians fraternise, marching round the stage as if impelled by common impulse. The stirring episode of the arrival of the chieftains with their followers in the third act is, of course, restored, and, in brief, the stage always presents a brilliant and animated picture, thanks, in great measure, to Madame Wagner, who labours from morning to night in order that everything shall be in accordance with her deceased husband's directions. So far unqualified admiration may be bestowed, but an analysis of the component parts of the orchestra, and of the principal artists, shows the direction in which weakness lies. The band is a capable and zealous force, and in discipline it is perfect; but the tone of the strings is thin and rough as compared with that of our best orchestras at home, with the exception of the double-basses, which are very fine and sonorous. The engagement of Mesdames Nordica and Marie Brema, as Elsa and Ortrud, has given much umbrage to those who declare that none but Germans should be permitted to take part in these performances, and not without reason, for the pure vocalisation of these English-speaking artists shows up in painful relief the typical faults in the German method of singing. Impartial critics were fain to admit that, vocally speaking, the parts of Kundry, Ortrud, and Elsa had never before been so tastefully and skilfully rendered in Germany. A very favourable impression was made by Mr. Popovici as Telramund, thanks to a fine and well produced baritone voice and much intelligence as an actor. Special reference is scarcely needed regarding the representatives of the other principal parts, though it may be said that M. Van Dyck is not improved in vocal delivery. "Parsifal" is, of course, still the mainstay of Bayreuth, and some sympathy may be felt with the desperate efforts of Madame Wagner, so far successful, to prevent this sacred music-drama from being performed elsewhere. Without "Parsifal," the Bayreuth Festivals would have no longer a raison d'être; further, it cannot be too strongly urged and reiterated that the presentment of this unique work in an ordinary theatre could not fail to outrage the feelings of all right-thinking persons. Little need be said respecting this year's performances. A new exponent of the titular character has been found in Mr. Birrenkoven, who possesses a powerful tenor voice of fairly good quality, and not, as yet, much affected by German throaty production. With the exception of Madame Marie Brema, whose embodiment of Kundry, as indicated above, extorted praise from unwilling lips, the other characters were in more or less familiar hands. "Tannhäuser," the production of which, in 1891, created so much wonder and admiration, has been given several times with somewhat diminished effect, Wagner's early work being apparently left to take care of itself to a certain extent, the general impression being that even at Bayreuth carelessness may sometimes supervene. But, on the whole, the performance was little less striking than before, and to those who witnessed it for the first time the spectacular accessories must have been truly delightful. There have been three conductors this year—Messrs. Levi and Mottl and, for the first time, Mr. Richard Strauss. The two first-named could not well be replaced, but there was an uneasy suspicion that Mr. Strauss is scarcely as yet up to the Bayreuth standard. Certainly the orchestra under his bâton played in a somewhat tame and perfunctory fashion. As regards the future, it is confidently stated that "Der Ring des Nibelungen" will be revived on a grand scale in 1896, and that, contrary to the original intention, performances will be given next year of "Parsifal," "Tannhäuser," "Tristan und Isolde," and "Die Meistersinger." There is at present no final confirmation of this, but the chances are that the Wagner Theatre will not remain desolate and void for two years.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THIS Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the Studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

FIFTY-TWO BOOKS, PRICE ONE SHILLING EACH.

"Mr. Franklin Taylor's splendid series of 'Progressive Studies' has advanced considerably since the earlier books were reviewed in The Times; those lately issued contain a book of Staccato Studies, two books of 'Repetition and Tremolo,' two of 'Part-playing,' and two of 'Rhythm.' The examples are chosen from numerous sources that are not, for the most part, in the ordinary repertory of the schools; and it is almost pathetic to think of the acres of Czerny's works, for example, that the able editor must have traversed in order to find good studies for the different branches of his book. His own examples are one and all excellent in design, and many of them are agreeable compositions, though all keep their practical end well in view. The choice of examples for 'Part-playing' was so wide that this of itself must have been a difficulty; the arrangements from Rink's Organ School are very suitable, and this division of the book ends with a Fugue by Mozart. No doubt the reason for not including any examples by Bach in this class was that the immortal '48' are in themselves the highest school of part-playing, and that any mere selection from them would be very little use. The books on 'Rhythm' contain many different kinds of difficulties, and here and there are studies that look quite easy at first, only revealing after a time some passage calculated to entrap the unwary student. The collection is entirely worthy of praise, and when the set of fifty-two books is completed it should be recognised as the standard work on technique."—The Times, December 11, 1893.

LONDON & NEW YORK: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

As a not inappropriate appendix a few words may be added on the cycle of Wagner's works that was begun in Munich on the 8th ult., and is to be continued until the beginning of October. "Tristan," "The Ring of the Nibelung," and "The Mastersingers" form the programme, which is to be gone through four times in all. In addition to the stock company of the Royal Opera-house, several artists from the chief German stages are taking part, such as Gudehus and Madame Staudigl from Berlin, Schelper from Leipzig, Hofmüller from Dresden, and Wiegand from Hamburg. The result has been a cast of unwonted all-round excellence, perhaps more brilliant than that of Bayreuth, with which comparisons are inevitable, and are indeed challenged. The remarkably fine singing of the two veteran tenors, Vogl and Gudehus, as Siegfried and Tristan respectively, has been one of the most notable features of these admirable performances.

Miss Ternina's impersonation of Brünnhilde in the first representation of the "Ring" was charmingly sympathetic, her singing being notably pure and agreeable, and her acting excellent, especially in the great scene of her awakening by Siegfried, in which the mingling of joy at her return to consciousness with regrets at the loss of her maidenly freedom was rendered with touching fidelity. In the "Götterdämmerung," too, the powerful drama and masterly musical treatment of which entitle it to be regarded as in every sense the culmination of the whole work, Miss Ternina showed truly tragic intensity and power. Mr. Wiegand has frequently been heard in England, but in no part with such success as in that of Hagen, the sinister aspect of whose character he rendered admirably.

While the masterly conductorship of the Munich Capellmeister, Levi, has been the chief cause of the musical success of this cycle, an important factor has been the excellent stage management and especially the thoroughly artistic lighting of the stage. With scenery appropriate and well designed, but not superior to what may be seen at the principal London theatres, results are obtained far more varied and subtle than any achieved in our theatres, excepting, it may be, the Lyceum. The difference is just what is to be expected from entrusting the management of the lighting apparatus to an artist instead of to an ordinary workman.

Some of the stage pictures were excellent—notably the opening scene of "Rheingold," in the bed of the river, and the concluding scene of "Die Walküre." The dragon, though inevitably somewhat pantomimic, was at least more plausible from the zoologist's point of view than usual, and generally the wonderfully smooth working of the stage machinery showed the excellence of the management. The exact adherence to the time-table given in the programme for the commencement of each act was a matter of detail which Covent Garden might copy with advantage.

CO-OPERATORS AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

The National Co-operative Society held its annual fête at the Crystal Palace on the 18th ult. A choir of about 8,000 adult singers had entered for the great Choral Concert which is one of the strongest features of this gathering, but, of course, the services of only about 5,000 could be accepted. A choral contest was held in the morning; seven choirs entered, all from the provinces. Each choir consisted of about sixty singers. The test piece named was Horsley's glee, "See the chariot at hand," and each choir also submitted a piece of its own choice. The singing throughout was excellent, all the conductors exhibiting skill in choral training. The winning choirs gained their position by performances that would have been creditable to the best choirs in the country. Mr. McNaught was the judge. His adjudication was as follows:—Bacup, first prize of £10; Leeds, second prize of £5; Earls Barton and Nottingham, highly commended; Wolverton, Brownfields, and Leicester, honourable mention. The Bacup Choir sang "Moonlight" (Faning) and the Leeds Choir "The sea hath its pearls" (Pinsuti)

The great Choral Concert gave an immense amount of enjoyment to a large and enthusiastic audience. The programme in the main consisted of light and easy pieces that served very well to show off the grand volume of tone at the command of this body of singers, who, we were informed, were chiefly provincials. Mr. Charles Nixon, whose compositions at similar gatherings we have before favourably noticed, contributed two pieces, "Hark! across the morning glory" (specially written for the Co-operative Society), a smooth chorus without any striking effects, and "The Language of the Bells," a long piece in which, in our opinion, monotony of key was hardly sufficiently relieved by variety of rhythm. Both pieces, however, were well received. Mr. G. W. Williams conducted with marked success. His popularity with the choir and audience seemed unbounded.

THE PRECURSORS OF THE PIANOFORTE.

Music was well represented at the recent meeting at Oxford of the British Association, by the Lecture delivered, on the 9th ult., by Mr. F. Cunningham Woods, Organist of Exeter College, on the "Precursors of the Pianoforte." Mr. Woods went back to Genesis for his starting-point, and described the ninnor, descendants of which primitive instrument are still to be met with in the East under the name of the kissar, or Nubian lyre. The origin of the modern pianoforte was attributed to the psaltery and dulcimer, the strings being plucked in the former and struck in the latter; and the system of using the same string to produce sounds of different pitch, as sometimes done in the clavichord, was stated to be derived from the ancient symphonia or organistrum. The lecturer said that in an English clavichord by Peter Hicks, in the possession of Mr T. L. Southgate, three notes were obtained from each of its sets of double strings in the upper part of the keyboard; in the medium register two notes were obtained by similar means, and it was only in the lowest half-octave that each note had its own string. The peculiarities of the virginal and spinet were also explained, the lecturer concluding his remarks by brief descriptions of the most important improvements effected in the pianoforte down to the present time. The interest of the Lecture was greatly enhanced by the fine collection of ancient instruments kindly exhibited by Mr. Taphouse. These comprised a kissar or Ethiopian or Nubian lyre, an Egyptian psaltery, an Irish harp (early nineteenth century), an English dulcimer (early nineteenth century), an Italian dulcimer (middle of eighteenth century), an Italian virginal (about 1590), a spinet, by Hayward (1683); a spinet, by Edward Blunt (1703); a two-manual harpsichord, by Kirkman (1744); and one of the earliest pianofortes made in England, by Zumpe (1767). The musical examples, admirably interpreted by Miss Taphouse, comprised Bach's first Prelude and Fugue in C, played on the clavichord; a "Pavane" and "Galliard," by Byrde, and the "Gigue," from Dr. Arne's Sixth Sonata, performed on the spinet; and the Prelude from the first lesson for harpsichord, by Handel; and No. 28 of Domenico Scarlatti's "Fifty Harpsichord Lessons," both the last-named pieces being rendered on the instrument for which they were written.

We are glad to learn that Mr. A. J. Hipkins has accepted the post of Curator of the instruments at the Royal College of Music. These include the fine specimens of Indian musical instruments presented by Sir S. Mohun Tagore, and the unique collection of spinets, harpsichords, virginals, clavichords, and other antique instruments now in the Donaldson Museum. Mr. Barclay Squire, of the British Museum, has also undertaken the office of Librarian to the College. It will be remembered that the fine library formerly belonging to the Sacred Harmonic (and which was for some years under the charge of Messrs. Novello) is now in the possession of the Royal College. No more fitting custodians for these valuable properties could have been secured.

It is intended to present a testimonial to Dr. G. M. Garrett, in recognition of his services to music during the past fifty years; and a fund is being raised by subscription for this purpose.

REVIEWS.

The Cradle of Christ. A Canticle for Christmas. Music by J. Frederick Bridge.

Sir Ogie and the Ladie Elsie. Music by Charles Harford Lloyd.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The two brief works named above are to be heard for the first time at the approaching Hereford Festival, and it must be distinctly understood that the present remarks are intended to be merely descriptive and not critical, the time for judgment respecting the merits of the scores having not yet arrived. The "Stabat Mater dolorosa," generally attributed to the Franciscan ecclesiastical poet, Giacopone, has been set very many times—notably by Pergolesi, Haydn, Rossini, and Dvorák—but the companion hymn, "Stabat Mater speciosa," suggested by the manger cradle of Christ, as the other is by His cross, has been generally neglected, and Professor Bridge may be said to have had a free hand in setting it to music. He has adopted Dr. J. Mason Neale's translation, with verbal alterations in one section so as to avoid giving offence if the work is sung in English cathedrals and churches. Thus "Eia mater, fons amoris" becomes "Jesus, fount of life," and so forth. In the next number, "Virgo virginum," the sense of the original is maintained, but the composer prudently says that the words "may be without much strain imaginatively regarded as the request of one of those who stood beside the manger-cradle, and not in the light of a prayer." The cantata opens with an Andante pastorale, 9-8, chiefly in C minor, leading to a chorus in the same measure, but with the key of E flat major fairly well established. Without break we pass to a bass solo, "Who is He, that sight who beareth," placid at the beginning and close, 4-4 in C major, but with an agitated subjection in the tonic minor at the words "For the trespass of her nation." No. 3 is a carol chorus, "Jesus lying in the manger," in C, 6-8, Allegro moderato, rather quaint in phraseology and coming to a pianissimo close which should prove effective. The next number is that referred to above, in which the prayerful words are addressed not to the Virgin Mother as in the original, but to the Infant Redeemer. They are set as a soprano solo in A flat, Largo tranquillo, with a murmuring semiquaver accompaniment, except in the middle section, where the tonality changes to C minor and major. The air is throughout simple, tuneful, and devotional. The penultimate number is a five-part chorus (two sopranos), "Virgin, peerless of condition," commencing quietly in E flat, but working up to an Allegro con brio at the words "Him, whose birth, o'er death victorious." Here we have a fugato if not a strict fugue, with free use of chromatic progressions and an impressive climax, leading without break into the final movement, "All who love this stable truly." This is brief and reminiscent of the carol chorus, No. 3. Near the close the voices are divided into six parts, and the peaceful peroration is worthy of a work the predominant features of which are deep religious feeling and chastened expression.

Dr. Harford Lloyd's cantata will form the most interesting feature of the secular Concert in the Shire Hall on the first evening of the Festival. The words are an English version of the sixteenth century ballad from the Danish "Aage og Else," by Frederick York Powell, the music being for mezzo-soprano and baritone soli, chorus, and orchestra. The poem as "Englished" is rendered in quaint phraseology and spelling, the whole savouring distinctly of the North country. The wraith of a dead knight visits his lady-love's bower, and though his words are fraught with doom she follows him to a churchyard, where he vanishes after a few words of warning. The Ladie Elsie returns to her home and dies, presumably of a broken heart. The score opens with a chorus ostensibly in G minor, but very restless in tonality and tempi, the time signature changing frequently. The phantom knight (baritone) then puts in an appearance and is quickly followed by the soprano, who has a vigorous duet with the phantom, a curious effect being wrought by the alternation of the keys of E flat major and E minor. After some shuddering tremolando passages the chorus re-enters and helps to carry on the narrative to the close, which, after several changes of key and rhythm, is reached very quietly in G major. One figure is persistently used throughout the ballad, and the whole is well-knit and looks on paper as if it would prove impressive in performance.

The Philosophy of Singing. By Clara Kathleen Rogers. [Osgood, McIlvaine and Co.]

This volume, of some 200 pages, is worthy of the attention of every vocalist and teacher. To the student it will impart knowledge of the greatest importance; to the experienced vocalist it will provide food for profitable thought; to the teacher the facts it sets forth are invaluable. The book is divided into three parts. The first part deals with the purpose of expression in art; the action of the emotions, mind and body in singing; spontaneity, and automatism. The second portion is devoted to mechanism and technique, and contains a series of valuable and ingeniously devised exercises for the production of a good vocal tone, a clear articulation, and the acquirement of power of expression. The third division applies and elucidates what has gone before. That which, however, chiefly distinguishes the book from the many on the subject of singing, is the emphasis laid upon the importance of the singer's cultivating a high artistic ideal. Upon this and upon his perfect command of mind and body is shown to depend his real success. "A man can be no greater than his ideal," says the author, and "perfection in tone production is to be achieved by a long series of tentative expressions, which expressions must be referred, through the ear, to the inner consciousness, until the ideal expression of the individual is reached." The importance of the exercise of preconception, anticipation, imagination, and observation is thus enforced, and the intelligence of the singer placed in its proper primary position. The chapters on spontaneity and automatism contain much that will doubtless be new to many; but those who have studied the important subject will read these chapters with interest owing to the lucid manner in which the matter is handled. The artist will also find much that is worthy of his consideration in the chapter on "Dramatic Expression." The difference between real and assumed expression is thus happily defined: "Through the power of thought, or imagination, we can awaken and produce any emotion of which the human soul is capable, and the emotion thus produced will be genuine and vital; whereas the emotion represented by the mind acting directly on the body, without first reacting on the emotions themselves, will be dead and artificial." In other words, the author insists upon the old precept: believe yourself to be that which you would represent. To those afflicted with habitual nervousness the remarks on "stage fright" will bring comfort, although they include some unpalatable truths. What is known as "constitutional nervousness" is rightly explained to be an unbalanced mental condition: "nothing more nor less than a deeply rooted habit of wrong thinking which has become automatic." The great importance attached to the formation and cultivation of good habits forms the most valuable feature of Mrs. Rogers's philosophy, for it is the essential principal of successful training.

Life and Reminiscences of George J. Elvey. By Lady Elvey. [Sampson Low, Marston and Co.]

This volume will be welcomed by all musicians, and particularly by those who take an interest in church music. It is written by the fourth wife of the esteemed organist and composer in a simple, unaffected style that conveys to the reader an admirable idea of the gentle character and life-work of the man who, for forty-seven years, was Organist of St. George's Chapel, Windsor. The chief incidents of Sir George Elvey's life have already been mentioned in the obituary notice which appeared in the number of The Musical Times for January last, and the volume now before us is necessarily, in great measure, taken up by the relation of these events and those accessory particulars which, although in themselves of but small importance, often throw a new light on the doings of the past and possess special interest and value to the student. Lady Elvey denies that her husband was devoted to Handel and the old masters to the exclusion of more modern composers. "He enjoyed and admired Schumann, Chopin, Heller, and Rossini, . . ." but she admits "he did not admire that modern music which, forsaking all rules, is for ever striving after an effect to which it never attains," and this obviously involves a matter of opinion on which much difference might exist. Later on we find, "It is quite true that the brothers Elvey had the correct reading of Handel's works, as regards tempo, &c., by tradition and instinct, through Dr. Crotch," and this belief was apparently the cause of their being so jealous of the manner in which the master's works were rendered. It is related that once, when conducting a rehearsal of "The Messiah," one of the lady principals finished her song with an elaborate cadenza. Sir George waited until the end, and then said: "What's that? Don't you think if Handel had wanted that he would have written it?" "Oh! we always do it in London," replied the lady. "Never mind," he answered; "here, Handel shall have it in his way, so please sing as it is written." Much interesting information is also given concerning the composition of the many fine anthems and services upon which the musician's fame will in the future chiefly rest, a complete list of which, published and unpublished, will be found at the end of the book. Perhaps, however, the real value of Lady Elvey's loving memoir is the manner in which it emphasises the earnest and devotional spirit which animated her husband in all his undertakings, and particularly in his church work. In this latter particular the volume may be read with profit by every organist, and should be found in the library of every organ student. Sir George Elvey's career was one of singular success, the causes of which may be found in the following lines, with which the volume concludes: "No one met Sir George Elvey at any time during his career but was struck with the intense passionate love of the man for his work and for the holy zeal and conscientiousness that characterised the simplest details of his daily life. The soul of the man breathed through his music, and his music was such as made for righteousness. From a boy his life was marked by gentleness, purity, and unswerving consistency to the Master whom he loved and lived to serve."

School Songs. Books 24 to 43. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The rapid growth of this publication affords indication of the strides in advance made of late in the teaching of music in elementary schools. The days when immense sums of public money were squandered in making children sing a few tunes by ear are past, never, let us hope, to return, and the advocates alike of the staff and the tonic sol-fa notation have agreed, for the most part, to bury the hatchet and to work side by side in honourable rivalry. It would occupy too much space to describe the contents of all the above-named books in detail, but it should be noted that in nearly all cases both notations are given, and that in the series may be found unison songs with, of course, pianoforte accompaniment, duets and trios without accompaniment, sight-singing studies in staff and sol-fa, action songs, classical songs by such composers as Handel, Mozart, Schubert, Spohr, and Mendelssohn, and vocal dances. Here, then, is infinite variety, and teachers have only to peruse the list in order to find something precisely suited to their needs. The books are published in a convenient octavo form, each containing from half-a-dozen lyrics. Books 39, 40, and 41 demand special reference. These are smaller in size, and contain the melodies of forty-five ditties by the most eminent English composers, being settings of a collection of sacred and moral poems entitled "The Sunlight of Song." These songs are specially appropriate for Sunday School use.

Parted Lovers. By M. Bergson. [Augener and Co.]

A well written song, which, presumably in recognition of the fact that parted lovers are to be found amongst the possessors of all classes of voices, the composer has arranged for soprano, contralto, tenor, and bass vocalists. The words are, of course, somewhat depressing, but their spirit is happily reflected by the setting, which, moreover, a dramatic vocalist could make effective.

Cambrian Minstrelsie (Alawon Gwalia). A national collection of Welsh songs. Words edited by David Rowlands, B.A. Music edited and harmonised by Joseph Parry, Mus. Doc. [Edinburgh: T. C. and E. C. Jack.]

These volumes are uniform in size, paper, and printing with those containing Scottish songs issued by the same firm and recently noticed in our columns. Each collection, when completed, will consist of six volumes, the paging of which suggests that they are intended to be eventually bound in two by those who are foolish enough to prefer bulk to convenience. Several Welsh melodies — say, roughly, a dozen, or, at most, a score—are well-known in every corner of the British empire; but a glance through this collection will convince any person of taste that the favour shown to these lucky tunes might very well be extended to many others that are at present all but unknown. A celebrated Welsh writer has given the names of no less than 1,195 airs native to the Principality. Many of these, it is true, are no longer extant; but when due deduction is made the result is still sufficiently rich to satisfy even a Welshman's pride in his heritage of song. As in the case of the volumes filled by Scottish genius, "Cambrian Minstrelsie" is enriched by historical and biographical notes, whose only fault is that their number is small. We cannot unreservedly praise the accompaniments to the songs. They are, indeed, appropriately simple, and so far, of course, meritorious; but simplicity, we fancy, does not involve absence of refinement, virility, and charm to such an extent as is here shown. Some of the bass progressions might have been written by a girl, such affection do they show for chords of the sixth!

Suite de Pièces in the olden style. By Alice Borton.
Three Scotch Pieces. By Alice Borton.
Berceuse pour Piano. Par Ethel M. Boyce.
[Edwin Ashdown.]

Mr. Stephen S. Stratton, in a paper entitled "Woman in relation to musical art," read some time ago at the Musical Association, gave a wonderful list of women composers, commencing with Maddalena Casulana of the sixteenth century; and though certain philosophers have denied to woman the possibility of genius, she has certainly made many interesting contributions to musical literature, and, if we mistake not, the number is daily increasing. The "Suite de Pièces," by Alice Borton, is a fair attempt to recall the music of the olden time, but here and there are modern effects which destroy the illusion; the connecting link between the various movements, after the manner of the early suite composers, is a point deserving of notice. The Allemande is a pleasing movement, but scarcely in Allemande style. The "Scotch Pieces" are well-known Scotch melodies with one or two simple variations; they are all three short and pleasing; the Scotch character of the theme is, perhaps, best preserved in the variations of No. 3, "Ballachulish." The Berceuse, by Ethel M. Boyce, has many good, and some weak moments. The opening, indefinite as to key, is peculiar; and, perhaps, not altogether satisfactory.

Suite for Flute and Pianoforte. By Herbert F. Sharpe. (Op. 62.)
Romance for Flute, with Pianoforte Accompaniment. By S. Jadassohn. (Op. 119.) [Rudall, Carte and Co.]

If there were many such enthusiastic flute-players as Frederick the Great, for whom Quantz is said to have written 300 Concertos, there would be much more music written for the instrument than is at present the case. The magnificent playing of M. Taffanel at the recent Wolff Musical Union Concert, in an interesting Suite for flute and pianoforte by M. Widor, may perhaps bring the flute into vogue; if for no higher purpose, it might be blown, à la Dick Swiveller, for cheering purposes. The Suite by Mr. Sharpe consists of a bright Bolero, a graceful Serenade, and a lively Saltarello. The Romance contains a flowing theme and graceful ornamentation thereof.

Song without Words. By Gustav Hölzel. Arranged for the harp by John Thomas. [Weekes and Co.]

This may be recommended to the attention of harpists of moderate executive abilities as an effective and melodious piece.

Novello's Part-Song Book. Nos. 704—709. Six Elizabethan Pastorals (second set) for chorus, unaccompanied. By C. V. Stanford. Op. 53.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The previous series of part-songs by Professor Stanford, for which the esteemed composer had selected verses from writers of the Elizabethan period, was so warmly received that there is no reason for surprise that he has furnished another set at the earliest opportunity. The titles of the new part-songs, which are all for four voices, are "On the hill there grows a flower," "Like desert woods," "Praised be Diana," "Cupid and Rosalind," "O shady vales," and "The Shepherd Doron's Jig." They are all charmingly fresh, though appropriately quaint in phraseology at times. Perhaps the gem of the set is No. 4, a delicious setting of Thomas Lodge's "Rosalind's Madrigal," this being quite equal if not superior to the composer's "Corydon, arise," in the previous set.

Short Anthems. Nos. 51, 52, and 53.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The first of these is "Watch ye and pray," by G. Rayleigh Vicars, a smoothly written and thoroughly devotional little anthem in E flat, six-four measure, formed on one text only. The next, "The path of the Lord," by J. Varley Roberts, is specially intended for Saints Days, and is a setting, melodious and unpretentious, but with effective harmonic progressions, of the 18th verse of the 4th chapter of Proverbs. "O Lord, correct me," by James Coward, is for Lent or general use, and though, like the others, perfectly simple, no soloists being required, the general feeling is distinctly modern both in melody and harmony. It may be again pointed out that the publication of this series of brief and easy anthems is to meet the want for such compositions for the Church's seasons, and especially for use as Introits.

Gavotte and Musette. For the Pianoforte. By Walter Fitton. [Edwin Ashdown.]

The theme of the Gavotte is quaint and shows promise, which is to some extent fulfilled; the Musette is graceful and in good contrast. The fault of the music is that it is not all in one style; the coda is certainly quite out of keeping with the Gavotte character in general, and also with the piece itself.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Antwerp.—At the Exposition M. Saint-Saëns conducted recently a French Musical Festival, which would have been more correctly styled a Saint-Saëns Festival, as all the more important works in the programme were from his versatile pen. M. Diémer played the solo part in the Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra entitled "Africa."——After this came a Russian Festival, under the famous Russian conductor, M. Winogradsky. His programme included a Symphony by Tschaikowsky, a musical picture, "Sadko," by Rimsky Karsakoff, Moussorgsky's "Sunrise at Moscow," an entr'acte from César Cui's opera "Ratcliff," and airs from Borodine's "Prince Igor," Rubinstein's "Nero," &c.

Bayreuth.—On July 21 a meeting of the General Richard Wagner Society was held here, at which it was officially announced that the number of members, which was 8,965 in 1891, is now only 4,988. It was decided to discontinue the publication of the Bayreuther Taschenkalender, and to vote the sum of 3,000 marks from the funds of the Society towards the support of the Bayreuther Blätter, edited by Herr Hans von Wolzogen, which will, therefore, continue to be issued as heretofore. From all of which it would appear that the "Verein" is not in an altogether flourishing condition. But what is the use of a Wagner Society at all, now that everybody fancies he understands the master and his works, and Bayreuth has become so absurdly and objectionably "fashionable"?——It is announced that next year "Parsifal," "Tristan," and "Die Meistersinger," or, instead of the last-named, perhaps "Lohengrin" will form the répertoire of the Festspiele. In 1896 "The Ring of the Nibelung" will be given with new scenery and costumes.

Berlin.—The famous dramatic singer, Frau Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch, has been engaged as principal teacher of singing at the Stern'sche Conservatoire in place of the lately deceased directress, Fräulein Jenny Meyer. She will join the teaching staff on October 1.——Dr. Heinrich Reimann has undertaken to collect and edit the literary works of the late Hans von Bülow. They date mostly from the earlier part of the great pianist-conductor's career, and appeared in various newspapers and reviews. They are expected to fill one volume, and cannot fail to prove interesting.—— Humperdinck's fairy opera, "Hänsel und Gretel," has been accepted for performance at the Royal Opera. This charming work, with its naïve story, seems to be a real and great success, for it has already been given at seven theatres, and twenty others—viz., those of Berlin, Dresden, Vienna, Stuttgart, Brunswick, Hamburg, Cologne, Leipzig, Lübeck, Strassburg, Halle, Mayence, Magdeburg, Düsseldorf, Dessau, Nuremberg, Hanover, Basle, Königsberg, and Graz have decided to perform it. Are the Germans at last getting tired of the Italian verismo, with its loathsome stories and "brutal" music?——The much-discussed "Song to Aegir," by the Emperor William, will be published early in October by Messrs. Bote and Bock, and the proceeds of the sales will be devoted to the fund for the erection of the splendid church in memory of the Emperor William I. It appears now that both the words and music of the song were written by the Emperor, who also made the pictorial sketch for the title-page. Professor Albert Becker, the conductor of the Berlin Cathedral Choir, has arranged the piece for male chorus and orchestra.——At the "Italy in Berlin" Exhibition an orchestra, said to be that of La Scala Theatre, Milan, and conducted by Maëstro Cav. Gialdino Gialdini, is giving some very enjoyable concerts, at which many orchestral works of the modern Italian school are frequently heard and much appreciated. There is also an Italian military band belonging to a regiment of Bersaglieri, or, at any rate, constituted in imitation of the genuine article, and a male-voice choir, the "Popolare Artistico Veneziano," sings under the direction of Signor Carcano.——Messrs. Ries and Erler have just published the vocal score of the amusing "Parodical Opera" in ½ (!) act, entitled "Una famiglia fina" ("A nice family"), composed by "Francesco Benizzo," which was performed here some time since. In this amusing work the plots of the "Cavalleria," "Pagliacci," and Hummel's one-act opera "Mara" are mixed up, and the styles of their respective composers burlesqued in the most mirth-moving fashion. The Intermezzo obbligato is, of course, an important feature, and the knife, poison, adultery, murder, and all the other essentials of a genuine lyric drama of the modern Italian type are to be found in this "half-act" piece of foolery.

Boulogne.—M. Isidore de Lara's opera, "Amy Robsart," was performed for the first time in France at Boulogne, on the 22nd ult., in connection with the opening of the new Casino Theatre. The title rôle was interpreted by Madame Adini; MM. Engel and Melchissédec were Leicester and Varney respectively; and M. Flon conducted.

Brussels.—During the coming winter M. Gevaert intends to perform Gluck's "Alceste" (with Madame Caron as the heroine) and the whole of Wagner's "Rheingold," at the Concerts du Conservatoire.——M. Gevaert is putting the finishing touches to a new and important work, which will form a sort of continuation and conclusion to his famous book on Greek music. It deals with the origin of plain chant in particular, and the music of the first centuries of our era and its relation to, and connection with, the last traces of Greek music in general. It is well known that a profound ignorance has hitherto prevailed as to the state of the art during this transitional period from the end of the second century to the Gregorian epoch and the dawn of modern music. If M. Gevaert's work is destined to clear the mystery surrounding this period, it cannot fail to become a most valuable, as it will be a unique, contribution to musical history.

Carlsbad.—The first performance on the Continent of Dvorák's new Symphony in E minor (No. 5) was recently given here, at a Symphony Concert, by the Curcapelle, under Herr August Labitzky. The work was received with great applause, the Largo having been redemanded.——The committee of the Carlsbader Musik-Verein has issued an appeal for contributions towards a fund for the erection of a monument to the second son of the great Mozart. This highly gifted musician, to whom his father's glorious name became a veritable giant's robe, died here on July 29, 1843.

Carlsruhe.—During the first weeks of October, Felix Mottl will conduct another Berlioz Cycle at the Court Theatre. The director of the Paris Théâtre de la Porte St. Martin, M. Lenormand, has promised to witness the performances with his whole troupe, his intention being the early production of some of the operas, notably of "Les Troyens," in Paris.

Cologne.—At the Gürzenich Summer Concerts, under the direction of Professor Gustav Holländer, several important new orchestral works have lately been produced; amongst them a symphonic poem, "Cain," founded by Franz Kessel on Byron's tragedy, and a Symphonic Fantasia in four parts, by Ewald Straesser, a professor at the local conservatoire, deserve special mention.——On July 20 Professor Holländer produced an Overture by a young English composer, Mr. Frank A. Gwyn, and entitled "Easter Sunday before the Gates" (after Goethe's "Faust"), of which the Cologne Gazette, in its issue of July 27, spoke in warm terms of approval.

Dresden.—Berlioz's opera, "Les Troyens," will be performed during the winter season, for the first time, at the Royal Court Theatre. A new opera, "Attila," by Gustav Gunkel, has been accepted for production at the same Institution.——During the last year the Court Theatre performed sixty-four operas by thirty-six composers, as well as three ballets and four dramas with incidental music. The novelties were Rubinstein's "Kinder der Haide," Pittrich's "Marga," and Umlauft's "Evanthia." Ten operas by Wagner were played on forty-nine evenings, Mascagni's three works were heard twenty-two times, Weber occupied seventeen evenings, Mozart sixteen, Verdi thirteen, Lortzing ten, Nessler ten, Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci" ten, Donizetti nine, and Gluck eight.——The antiquarian, Herr Richard Bertling, has lately acquired the autograph of the complete musical sketch of Wagner's "Tannhäuser." It is written throughout in a kind of compressed score, with the whole of the text and many details of the contemplated instrumentation. There are also, in numerous places, indications as to where and when the various scenes were begun and finished—thus, the first page bears the date "Dresden, November, 1843." An interesting point is the fact that this sketch contains both versions of the final scene, each with its date of completion. The same firm has also acquired a number of letters addressed by Wagner to his friend Ferdinand Heine. None of these are contained in the volume of "Letters to Th. Uhlig, Wilh. Fischer, and Ferd. Heine," published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel in 1888, and yet they are said to be amongst the most interesting and elaborate epistolary utterances of the master's which have become known so far. If this be so, it is to be hoped that their present owner will reconsider his reported decision not to offer these valuable documents for publication.

Düsseldorf.—Herr Felix Mottl conducted lately a grand orchestral Concert, the programme of which was devoted to works by Beethoven, Berlioz, and Wagner, and included the Bonn master's Eighth Symphony, the French master's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," selections from "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Faust" overture; the "Parsifal" prelude and the Liebestod from "Tristan." Frau Reuss-Belce sang the solo part in the last-named piece, as well as airs from "Les Troyens" and "Rienzi," and Herr von Brandrowski (who appeared last season at one of the Royal Choral Society's Concerts at the Albert Hall) was heard in the Schmiedelieder from "Siegfried."

Genoa.—There are rumours of a new opera which Verdi is said to be contemplating. This is not the "King Lear" of which so much has been heard, but "Ugolino," a subject which would certainly have suited the Verdi of former days most admirably. The veteran master is said to be studying the whole literature dealing with the history of the Count, and to have authorised the Italian musical littérateur, Professor Fedeli, to spare neither trouble nor expense to discover, if possible, the musical setting, by Vincenzo Galilei (the father of the great astronomer, Galileo Galilei), of the canto in Dante's "Inferno" which deals with Ugolino.——Verdi's apartments in the Doria Palace in this town were recently broken into by burglars, who carried off a considerable amount of booty, including the master's decorations, and maliciously destroyed or damaged a quantity of valuable objects belonging to the composer of "Falstaff."

Gotha.—The Court Theatre in this town will shortly be closed because the Landtag repeatedly refused to grant the 21,000 marks subvention which the Duke of Coburg-Gotha had demanded as a condition upon the fulfilment of which the future existence of the theatre was to depend. The Duke's decision has naturally caused great disappointment to the inhabitants.

Kreuznach.—A new comic opera, "Die Teufelsbrücke" ("The Devil's Bridge"), by Th. Tomaschek, was recently produced here at the Cur Theatre and very favourably received.

Landau (Palatinate).—Handel's "Joshua," with new additional accompaniments by Richard Schefter, was recently performed here, under the direction of Dr. Ernst Walter.

La Spezia.—"Andrea del Sarto" is the title of a new opera by Signor Baravella, which was produced here on the 4th ult. It contains an intermezzo which has to be played three times! Horrible thought! A rival and possibly a successor to the Intermezzo!

Leipzig.—According to the "Communications of the Society of German Musicsellers," no less than 10,372 musical publications were issued in Germany in 1893. Of this enormous number 490 works were for full orchestra, 35 for string orchestra, 193 for military band, 69 for brass band, 683 for stringed instruments, 370 for wind instruments, 20 for instruments of percussion, 12 for harp, 79 for mandoline, 6 for guitar, 7 for toy instruments, 138 for organ, 63 for harmonium, 3,242 for pianoforte, and, finally, 3,976 were vocal compositions. The comparatively small number of organ works and the many compositions for the mandoline (as compared with those for the poor, neglected, yet once so popular guitar) are specially noteworthy.—— Of the operatic novelties produced at the Town Theatre between July 1, 1893, and June 30, 1894, only two were by German composers. A significant sign of the times!

Lisbon.—At the Avenida Theatre a new three-act comic opera, entitled "The Daughter of Thomas Feijoca," and composed by Placida Stacchini, was recently produced with much success.

Lyons.—On the 12th and 13th ult. a grand Musical Tournament was held here, at which no less than 350 Bands and Choral Societies took part.

Mannheim.—The local Sing-Verein celebrated, on July 15, the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation by a Festival which culminated in a grand and very successful Concert.

Mayence.—On October 26, the death-day of Peter Cornelius, a memorial tablet with a bronze portrait of the poet-composer will be affixed to the house, Mittlere Bleiche, No. 28, in which he was born in 1824.

Milan.—Signor Sonzogno has rented the Scala Theatre for the purpose of giving a series of performances of works which will be new to the Milanese. He will open his season with M. Reyer's "Sigurd." M. Massenet's "Manon" and "La Navarraise," M. Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila," Paladilhe's "Patrie," and Delibes's "Sylvia" will follow in due course. Mascagni's "Ratcliff" and a new opera by Baron Franchetti are also mentioned in connection with the enterprise. As if this were not enough, there are rumours of a German Opera season, with an orchestra of 150 (?) players and German singers, which will perform Beethoven's "Fidelio," Mozart's "Magic Flute," and, of course, Wagner's operas and music-dramas.——Mascagni has nearly completed a new opera. Its title is "Serafino d'Albania," and the libretto is founded on a novel by Nicola Misa. The autumn of 1895 will probably witness the production.

Paris.—The novelties announced for the next season at the Opéra Comique are "Xavière," by Théodore Dubois, libretto by M. Gallet; "La Vivandière," written by M. Cain and composed by Benjamin Godard; "Guernica," by M. Vidal; "Ninon," by M. Missa; and two other works by MM. Leroux and Serpette.——Madame Gounod and her son, M. Jean Gounod, are engaged on a memoir of the composer of "Faust." The deceased master was in the habit of jotting down his impressions from day to day. These notes, and a large number of letters which have been placed at the disposal of Madame Gounod by her husband's friends, will enable her to compile an interesting volume.——Verdi is said to have recently forwarded the manuscript of the Finale to the third act of his "Otello" to the director of the Grand Opéra, after having completely re-written it, with a view to the forthcoming production at the said Institution. The veteran composer has also promised to write a grand March, which is to accompany the entry of the Doge in the same act.——Signor Sonzogno will give twenty-four performances of Italian operas at the Porte-Saint Martin Theatre during next spring. Amongst the works to be performed are "I Pagliacci," "Amico Fritz," "Il Piccolo Haydn," "Festa e Marina," &c.——Franz von Suppé's operetta "Juanita" was lately given for the first time in Paris at the Théâtre Parisien, and proved a success, in spite of an inferior performance.——On July 31 the magnificent organ of Nôtre Dâme de Paris, which has just been renovated by M. A. Cavaillé Coll, was inaugurated. MM. Widor, Guilmant, Gigout, and Serpent performed a number of compositions which displayed the splendid qualities of the instrument to the greatest advantage.

Pernambuco (Brazil).—A three-act opera, "Raffaelo," by a resident Italian musician, Signor Napoleone Maffezzoli, was lately produced at the Santa Isabel Theatre here with conspicuous success.

Rio de Janeiro.—The Politeama Theatre has been destroyed by fire, which broke out during a performance of "Rigoletto" and while three thousand spectators filled the house. Considering that the latter was built entirely of wood, it is nothing short of miraculous that, under the circumstances, the catastrophe did not develop into an awful tragedy. Fortunately there were no lives lost.

Rome.—A local paper, the Arte del Popolo, recently gladdened the hearts of its readers with the startling news that "Richard Wagner is writing a new opera!" It added facetiously: "It is to be hoped that the new work will not be so difficult as the other operas by the same master, which one can't understand at the first hearing, still less at the second, and least of all at the third!" Clever editor!——A new operetta by Signor Balderi, and entitled "Un Eretità in Corsica," was lately produced here with success. The interpreters were all amateurs.

St. Petersburg.—Mr. Isidore de Lara's opera, "Amy Robsart," was, on July 29, performed for the first time at the Alexandroff Theatre and very warmly received. The artists were recalled twice after each act and some of the airs and ensembles were enthusiastically encored.

Siena.—On the 4th ult. a new opera, "Dea," by Signor Pollione Ronzi, was produced here.

Vienna.—Johannes Brahms has arranged and edited forty-nine German Folk-songs which will shortly be published in seven books. An English edition, for which Mr. Albert B. Bach, of Edinburgh, has supplied the translations of the poems, as well as a preface, is also in course of preparation.——In connection with his forthcoming jubilee, Johann Strauss has written a new operetta called "Das Apfelfest," which title would sound anything but romantic in English if translated into "The Apple Festival." It will be produced on October 15 at the Theater an der Wien.——During the season 1893-4 the Court Opera gave 272 performances of sixty-three works by forty-two composers. Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci" heads the list with twenty-seven performances; Mascagni's "Cavalleria" was heard eighteen, Smetana's "Der Kuss" twelve, and Bizet's "Carmen" ten times. With the exception of "Parsifal," all Wagner's music-dramas were represented; the "Flying Dutchman" was most in request, nine performances having been given of that work.

Zweibrücken.—On July 31 and August 1, 1844, Mendelssohn conducted a Musical Festival in this town, at which his Oratorio "St. Paul" was performed. To celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of this memorable event, the St. Cecilia Society, under Herr A. Gehlen, recently held a Festival, on the first day of which the said great work was given with conspicuous success.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

The musical entertainment afforded us here during the past few months has chiefly been of an al fresco character. Much interest has been stimulated in the question of providing music for the people in the shape of open-air concerts at the public parks and elsewhere; but the municipal authorities, though sounded upon the matter, have not yet become willing to subvention any such undertakings, so that whatever has been done in this direction is entirely owing to the self-sacrificing efforts of musical ladies and gentlemen, amateur and professional. It is a pity—one might, perhaps, characterise it as somewhat of a disgrace—that this city should not possess at least its own official military band and rejoice in a proper scheme of public open-air music. There exist, however, some very proficient amateur bands of the military sort, which have not been chary of their services. The Police Band, entirely composed of the guardians of our peace, is an excellently organised one; several of our large manufactories can muster each skilful players enough to compose a full and proper orchestra; there is, too, a juvenile body of the kind, which has proved itself not at all a despicable one. The vocal element, moreover, has been an interesting feature during the present season at these concerts in the parks. Our best local talent has been in evidence, and there is no doubt as to the great pleasure derived from these performances. The vocal orchestra, twenty-four strong, directed by Mr. Monteith Randell, has been a very noticeable feature upon several occasions.

At Moseley Botanical Gardens—in which very pleasant grounds stands the building known until recently as the Training College for Congregational Ministers—Mr. William Moore directs a very good (permanent) orchestra, and with one or two popular vocalists some very varied and interesting programmes are submitted each evening throughout the week. Mr. Moore is an excellent musician and musical organiser, and with the means at his command produces some very praiseworthy results.

At the Botanical Gardens at Edgbaston—the qualifying term (botanical) here being more than a mere flourish—the authorities have lately availed themselves of the services of Mr. Oscar Pollack as musical director. In one of the large conservatory buildings some extremely enjoyable Concerts have been given on certain Wednesday evenings throughout the season. Mr. Pollack has secured the assistance of a goodly number of capable vocalists and instrumentalists; so that, among these pleasant surroundings, upon fine summer evenings, listening to the well-delivered strains of a well-selected piece of music, one may very satisfactorily escape for awhile the anxieties of every-day life.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The only musical event of interest during the past month was the visit of the Bristol Gleemen to Midsomer Norton, on the 11th ult., when they sang several favourite part-songs, glees, and solos on the lawn of Norton House, the residence of Mr. Frederick Bird. Mr. W. J. Kidner conducted. The band of the G Company, P.A.S.L.I. Volunteers, under the direction of Mr. W. R. Norris, also assisted.

The Bristol Scholarship at the Royal College of Music has been won by Master Brock, the son of a member of a local firm of musicsellers. The youth makes the violoncello his chief study.

At a Conversazione at Clifton College, on the 1st ult., the Orpheus Glee Society, under the direction of Mr. George Riseley, sang some of the choicest compositions in their répertoire, and Mr. Riseley also gave a Recital on the College organ.

There was a reception by the Mayor and Mayoress of Bristol in Colston Hall, on the 3rd ult., when the Madrigal Society interpreted some famous madrigals of the Elizabethan period, with which were alternated several part-songs of modern writers by way of contrast. They were excellently sung under the guidance of Mr. D. W. Rootham.

Since the new Pump Room at Clifton was opened, at the beginning of August, several Concerts have been given in the handsome and noble hall. The programmes have included vocal and instrumental solos and orchestral compositions.

The church choirs of the Western division of the Chew Decanal Choral Association took part in a Festival in St. John's Church, Clevedon, on the 21st ult. The choirs attending were Nailsea, Winford, Leigh Woods, Tyntesfield, Dundry, Nempnett, Barrow Gurney, Wraxall, Failand, Chew Stoke, St. John's (Clevedon), St. Mary's (Walton), Flax Bourton, and Yatton, the singers numbering 250. Mr. J. W. Lawson (Bristol) was the Conductor, and he was assisted by Messrs. H. Hayman and J. Winter; Mr. W. Somerton presiding at the organ. The service was fully choral; Tallis's setting of the Preces and Responses was used, the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were E. C. Winchester's in A and C, and the anthem was Sir John Goss's "Fear not, O land." The music was sung with surprising smoothness, clearness, and precision, and the tone of the voices was of remarkably good quality, considering that they were drawn from country districts. All taking part in the Festival are to be congratulated on its striking success. The Dean of Wells was the preacher.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

Preparations in connection with the local musical season are actively on foot, and, after all, it looks as if we were to have a busy winter. For the last three months little or nothing has been doing, and amateurs have had to content themselves with the music discoursed in the public parks by several well-trained bands. The parks' season is, however, practically over, and lovers of the lyric drama are looking forward to the brief engagement of Sir Augustus Harris's Opera Company, which opens at the Theatre Royal on the 17th inst., under promising auspices. It is understood that the Covent Garden impresario brings "Falstaff," "Die Meistersinger," and "La Navarraise" to the provinces as his leading novelties, and that special attention will be paid to the choral and orchestral adjuncts. Messrs. Feld and Seppilli return as conductors, and the troupe will include Mesdames Ravogli, Lucille Hill, and Olitzka; Messrs. Dufriche, Bispham, and other equally well known artists.

As has already been noted in The Musical Times, the couple of rival orchestras have coalesced, and under the new arrangements the concert operations for the coming winter will be conducted by a joint-committee representing the Scottish Orchestra Company (Limited) and the Festival Executive Committee, under the title of the Choral and Orchestral Union. The Festival Executive Committee require to provide a minimum guarantee fund of £2,000 for the coming season. Should there be a loss on the series of concerts, which extends from the end of October till the middle of March next, the Scottish Orchestra Company agree to meet it out of their own funds to the extent of £3,000. Any loss incurred beyond this sum will be met equally by the Company and the Guarantors till the minimum Guarantee Fund is exhausted, after which the Orchestra Company is alone responsible. There is, it need hardly be said, much satisfaction over the treaty of peace, and everything should now proceed as merrily as the proverbial marriage bell. Last season's Choral Union accounts showed, by the way, a deficit of £3,131, involving a call on the guarantors of 15s. 6d. per pound. Mr. August Manns has not been able to see his way to take part in next season's concerts. Let the veteran Sydenham chef be assured, however, that his many Glasgow friends can never forget his long and valued services to the cause of music North of the Tweed. Mr. Henschel returns, of course, as Conductor of the Orchestral Concerts, the programmes for which are now in course of preparation. Mr. Joseph Bradley resumes his old post as Choral Conductor, and the works already fixed include "The Messiah," "Elijah," and Berlioz's "Faust."

A remarkably interesting prospectus has been issued by the management of the Athenæum School of Music, in connection with the opening of the fifth session of that flourishing establishment. The directors have secured the services as principal violin master of Mr. Elkan Kosman, so well known as a soloist and as the leader of the Choral Union orchestra. This step cannot fail to add to the popularity of the Athenæum as a high-class musical centre. The tuition will, moreover, be on the principle adopted in the Paris Conservatoire. In response to a widely expressed desire, it has been decided to repeat the performance of Gounod's "Mirella," which was so favourably received in March last. Five representations of the opera will, indeed, be given, and during the coming season the students will also rehearse Boieldieu's opera "La Dame Blanche," with a view to performance early next spring.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

The Philharmonic Society has issued the first edition of its prospectus for the coming season, and though the document is not especially comprehensive, it suffices as an indication of the policy to be pursued between October 9 and March 26, which dates form the limit of time allotted to the Concerts of 1894-95. The choral novelties are to be Dr. C. H. Parry's "Job" and Tinel's Cantata "The Lay of the Poppies," both of which will be given on November 20; Handel's familiar "Judas Maccabæus" being announced for the Christmas Concert. The only Symphonies yet promised are Beethoven's "Eroica" and Dvorák's latest musical message from his present home, which he whimsically styles "From the new world." Miss Fanny Davies and Lady Hallé are announced as instrumental soloists, but no concerto or other work for either pianoforte or violin is as yet included in the printed scheme. The latter, however, would seem to place again in evidence the fact that the coming days are to be made still more and more remote from those when concerto as well as symphony found a place at three or four out of six such Concerts. Upon such a retrograde movement the directors of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society can hardly claim congratulation. Sir Charles Hallé is again to be the Conductor.

There has been some very good military music in the parks during the past month, one notable feature of which has been the playing of a band on Sundays, under the direction of Mr. F. R. Howell. A large amount of opposition was offered to such a departure last year, but the more liberal-minded majority happily prevailed, and such music may be now taken as a regular factor in our weekly régime during the summer. The Sunday Society, which exploited this together with other local revolutions, purposes giving ten Sunday Concerts at St. George's Hall between October and March. Of these six or seven will be Orchestral, and the remainder devoted to Chamber Music.

For the opening of its season the Orchestral Society proposes a scheme of the following proportions: Symphonies: Beethoven's No. 8, Schubert's "Unfinished," and one of Mr. Cliffe's; Overtures: Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" and Mendelssohn's "Hebrides." These pieces, together with an arrangement of some of Wagner's "Parsifal" music, will afford a fair amount of work for this fine organisation. But this is not all, for in the scheme of the Conductor, Mr. A. E. Rodewald, is also included some new music by Grieg, Edward German, and Tschaikowsky, and the whole programme will probably prove the best yet offered by this excellent Society.

The action of the Lancashire County Council in granting Musical Scholarships, that of the Liverpool Corporation in the same direction, and the commendable move of the Garston Local Board in providing teachers of singing for public classes is being emulated at Wavertree. In the latter out-township elementary and advanced classes are to be carried on at the expense of public funds during the coming season.

A month hence it may be assumed that most of the local choral societies will have formulated their plans for the winter, but up to the present the current gossip on such a subject is too unreliable to bear repetition.

Alderman Samuelson, whose title is derived from Liverpool, but who has been for many years past a resident of Wales, has been again speaking no unmeasured or unmeaning words on the subject of music in the principality. As on former occasions at the important local Eisteddfod held annually in Llanrwst (the capital of the ancient Venadocian Vale), this excellent amateur, who was at one time a member of the Liverpool Philharmonic orchestra, spoke strongly on the subject of the orchestral side of art. Again he urged the people among whom his residence had been taken up to adopt serious measures of reform in such a direction. At the same meeting the Alderman performed a solo on the crwth and Mr. Carrodus gave some violin solos.

A new Society, entitled the London Choral Union, will appeal to the London public during the coming season. Four Concerts will be given at the Queen's Hall, on Tuesdays, November 13, December 18, February 26, and April 30. The works announced are "The Messiah," Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and "St. Paul," Sullivan's "Golden Legend"; and a new cantata, the "Ballad of Carmilhan," by a rising young composer, Mr. Davidson Arnott, is to be produced. An admirable array of solo vocalists has been secured; the orchestra and choir will number 400 performers; the Organist will be Mr. Fountain Meen; and the Conductor, Mr. James W. Lewis. The proceeds of the performances will be devoted to providing free meals for children, food and shelter for the homeless, relief of families in distress, and, in various other ways, helping the poor of London. Certainly the high aim of the performances, and the specially popular prices charged, should lead to a generous support of the enterprise.

The Thursday Subscription Concerts are now under the management of Messrs. R. Cocks and Co., who announce six Concerts (four morning and two evening), to be given at the Queen's (small) Hall, commencing on November 1 and terminating on March 21. The first part of each Concert will be devoted to the works of one composer—those selected for this series being: Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, Schubert, Schumann, Dr. Hubert Parry, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn. Messrs. William Nicholl, Hans Adolf Brousil, Otto Peiniger, and Septimus Webbe, the originators of the series, will, of course, take part in each programme; and Miss Esther Palliser, Madame Fanny Moody, Miss Louise Phillips, Mr. Arthur Oswald, Mr. Charles Manners, and others will appear during the series. Miss Mary Carmichael and Mr. Arthur E. Godfrey will act as accompanists.

The chief event of musical interest this month will be the Three Choirs Festival at Hereford, which takes place from the 11th to the 14th inst. Details of the programmes have already appeared in these columns, but we may remind our readers that the novelties are a sacred cantata, "The Cradle of Christ," by Dr. J. F. Bridge, and a secular cantata, "Sir Ogie and the Ladie Elsie," by Dr. C. Harford Lloyd. The tastes of all kinds of music-lovers have been considered, Wagner being represented by excerpts from his operas—notably the "Parsifal" Vorspiel; Bach by the "Christmas Oratorio"; Handel by "The Messiah"; and Mendelssohn, Spohr, and Dvorák have not been forgotten. Apart from the novelties, English music will be worthily represented by Mackenzie's "Bethlehem," Act II., and Parry's "Job."

The committee of the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association, in issuing the prospectus of their seventeenth series, announce four Concerts during the coming season. These will comprise Sullivan's ever-popular "Golden Legend"; a Chamber Concert, at which Sir Charles and Lady Hallé will appear; a miscellaneous Concert, for which the services of Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Johannes Wolff, and others have been secured; and a Christmas performance of "The Messiah," which has not been given by the Society since 1885. The absence of any novelty in the prospectus seems hardly justified, seeing that the balance-sheet of the Society shows a gratifying credit balance of £50, an indication of prosperity which many other societies would probably be glad to emulate.

Mr. Charles Fry announces a series of Four Recitals with special musical accompaniment, to be given, with the assistance of Miss Olive Kennett, at the Salle Erard in the Autumn. The programmes will include selections from "Romeo and Juliet," for which Mr. Berthold Tours is writing incidental music; from the "Merchant of Venice," with Sir Arthur Sullivan's music; and from "Macbeth," with the music popularly known as Locke's, but which there is good authority for believing is by Purcell. This music has not been heard in London in association with the play for a number of years. Mr. Clement Locknane is also writing additional music for this Recital. Another feature of interest will be the introduction of several recitations with pianoforte accompaniment composed by Mr. Stanley Hawley.

Under the energetic and enthusiastic direction of the well-known antiquarian musician, the Rev. F. W. Galpin, a singularly interesting and quaint revival of old English dances and rustic sports, with appropriate music, took place on Bank Holiday, at Hatfield Broad Oak. The events included "Maypole" and "Morris" dances, and "a Jig for the Merry Milkmaids," executed by eight Milkmaids with pails and stools, who danced a kind of double reel, or two single reels, at right angles to each other. The sports comprised "The Popinjay," in which Foresters shot at a gaudily-painted effigy of a parrot, and "Tilting at the Quintain." Appropriate instrumental accompaniments were provided, and the performance was witnessed by a large and appreciative audience.

Four Concerts will be given during the season by the Dublin Musical Society. At the first, towards the end of November, Dr. Mackenzie's "Dream of Jubal" will be performed, with Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise"; "The Messiah" will be given at Christmas; "Elijah" in February; and the last Concert will comprise a new Mass by Dr. Joseph Smith, Conductor of the Society, and a Concert-Recital of Sullivan's opera "Ivanhoe." Engagements are pending with the following artists: Mdlle. Antoinette Trebelli, Miss Medora Henson, Madame Clara Samuell, Miss Clara Butt, Miss Pettican, Mr. Herbert Grover, Mr. Charles Manners, Mr. Andrew Black, and Mr. Charles Fry.

An address on "Music in South Africa" was given, on the 1st ult., to the students attending the Tonic Sol-fa College, by Mr. H. Nixon, Inspector of Schools to the Education Department of Cape Colony. Mr. Nixon stated that he had travelled throughout South Africa for upwards of a quarter of a century, and was able to compare the singing there with what he had heard in Europe and America. There were, he said, no finer singers in the world than the Kafirs, and he considered their proficiency was obtained through the Tonic Sol-fa system. The outlook in vocal music was most promising, and the Education Department had taken every possible means of encouraging singing by note.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company will, during the season, produce Mr. Hamish MacCunn's new opera "Jeanie Deans," the book for which—founded of course on Scott's "Heart of Midlothian"—has been furnished by Mr. Joseph Bennett. An English version (by Mr. William Grist) of Tasca's "Santa Lucia" and one of Bruneau's "L'Attaque du Moulin" are also in preparation. The "Meistersingers" will be heard in English, and among revivals will be Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon," and the late Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda." The season commenced at Blackpool on the 13th ult.

The organ built by the Farrand and Votey Company for the Festival Hall of the Chicago Exhibition has been acquired by the University School of Music, Ann Arbor, Michigan. The instrument belongs to what may be termed the giant class, for the possession of which there was recently a municipal craze. It contains nearly four thousand speaking pipes, acted upon by four manuals and the usual pedal board, and its acquirement by the Michigan school indicates not only an enterprising spirit, but a flourishing financial condition of the Institution.

During the recent season French music was very much en evidence, but it seems not improbable that in the coming Autumn we shall be subjected to an invasion of Chinese. A Celestial company is performing in France, while the Imperial Opera House at Vienna is busying itself in the production of a Chinese ballet entitled "Li-La." The national element is, however, not to assert itself in the music, and as "everything comes to London," for this prohibition we may be duly thankful.

At Trinity College, London, the Benedict Exhibition has been awarded to Mabel Phillips, the Sims Reeves Vocal Exhibition to Florence A. Jackson, the College Organ Exhibition to Reginald H. Hellyar, the College Violin Exhibition to Sydney J. Faulks, and the College Violoncello Exhibition to Edith Jessy Evans. The examiners were Prof. James Higgs, Mr. J. E. Hambleton, Mr. Henry Gibson, Mr. F. G. M. Ogbourne, Mr. J. T. Hutchinson, Dr. Pringuer, and Mr. Francesco Berger.

The third annual prospectus of the Bradford Permanent Orchestra announces a series of six Concerts, commencing on October 13 and terminating on March 9. It will include a Concert consisting mainly of Sir Arthur Sullivan's compositions, and the first part of the final Concert will be devoted to Dr. Hubert Parry's works, including "Blest Pair of Sirens," which will be sung by the Bradford Festival Choral Society.

At a recent meeting of the Cardiff Musical Society a draft programme for the triennial Festival to be held next year was submitted, including Berlioz's "Faust," Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," and "The Messiah." Professor Stanford had informed the committee that the work he would offer to the Festival was entitled "The Bard," and Sir Joseph Barnby had intimated that his work would take the form of a Te Deum.

Mr. H. H. Weltch, Goldsmiths' Exhibitioner, Keble College, Oxford, who has been for some years assistant secretary to Sir George Grove at the Royal College of Music, has been appointed secretary to the London Organ School and International College of Music, in place of Mr. Hilton Carter, who has now taken up his duties at the Guildhall School of Music.

Four Concerts will be given next season by the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society, under the direction of Mr. John Adcock. The first will consist of a Concert Recital of Gounod's "Faust," with Mr. Edward Lloyd and Miss Fanny Moody as the hero and heroine; and "The Messiah" and "Samson" will be included in the series.

The Lancashire County Council Musical Scholarship, of the value of £60 a year for three years, for pianoforte playing, has been awarded to Miss Mary Hindley. A large number of candidates entered for the competition. The examiners were Professor Villiers Stanford and Dr. F. E. Gladstone.

Sir Arthur Sullivan will be associated with Mr. Burnand as his literary collaborateur in the next production at the Savoy Theatre. This will be a new version of "The Contrabandista," a work in which the same author and composer collaborated as far back as 1867.

A new terror has recently been added in France to the bicycle. It appears a company of musicians have formed themselves into a club for the special object of having musical rides. There is a compensating fact, however—viz., the sounds will be fleeting.

Mr. Tivadar Nachèz has been engaged to give twenty-five Concerts, in conjunction with Mr. Algernon Ashton, through Germany and Austria. The tour will last from October 22 to November 17.

The prize of £50 recently offered by Tit Bits for the best Cricket Song, words and music, has been awarded to Mr. W. G. Wood and to Mr. Sinclair Dunn, the writer of the words.

The prize of £5, offered to the best candidate of the Higher Grade Pianoforte Examinations of Trinity College, has this year been awarded to Miss Gertrude Burnaby.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In his comments on my letter in your August number, pp. 524, 554, your critic seems to be uncertain of his ground. He endorses M. Gevaert's opinion that the transcript is parfaitement exact; and yet he makes admissions that are fatal to this view.

Thus, he says that "the notation does not indicate the particular tuning used in this or any other music." The transcript is based on the assumption that the tuning was the chroma toniaion; and here your critic admits that there is nothing in the original to show that this assumption is correct. He says that "the usual form of chromatic genus during the classical period seems to have been the toniaion of Aristoxenus, which was identical with the chromatic scale of the Pythagoræans (Gevaert, I., 320)." Equal temperament is adopted in the transcript; and here your critic admits that the chroma toniaion is incompatible with equal temperament. That is clear. Aristoxenus, pp. 45 and 46, defines a tone as the difference between the fourth and the fifth; so his tone was not a mean tone, but a major tone—i.e., a Pythagoræan tone. And in the chromatic scale of the Pythagoræans—see Ptolemy, Harmonics, ii. 14—the so-called half-tone was considerably less than a mean semitone, while the so-called tone-and-a-half was considerably more than three mean semitones.

I have been taking exception to the transcript on these two grounds—the use of equal temperament and the use of the chroma toniaion. Now, so far as I can see, your critic has given up the case for equal temperament; and as regards the chroma toniaion he does not argue that it must have been used, but only that it may have been.

If we suppose that the chroma was the toniaion, we have to suppose that the writer of the hymn used two different signs—K and I—for one and the same note, D natural. I deny the possibility of this. Your critic does not attempt to meet my argument about the difference between the forms K Λ M and I Λ M, or my other argument about the tetrachords with K and I together. He only says that "M. Reinach has explained that he considers the notes K and I as Homotones—i.e., two notes representing the same sound." That is merely a statement of M. Reinach's opinion: it does not go to prove that the opinion is well founded.

This point is raised in Mr. Bergholt's letter in connection with the passages in Aristides, p. 26, and Gaudentius, p. 23. I cannot describe his translation as felicitous; but in the original the meaning is plain enough. To put the thing briefly, both these authors say that when the notes in the octave were reduced from twenty-one to twelve, musicians were left with more signs than notes, and it did not matter which of the available signs they selected for use. Thus, when one of the notes was omitted between I and M, it did not matter whether the remaining note was described as K or Λ. In all such cases Aristides took the first note of the two, whereas Gaudentius seems to have taken the second.

I presume that Mr. Bergholt's notion is that this will justify the transcript in giving D natural for K as well as I. Aristides and Gaudentius, however, are describing the music of a later age. And even if their scheme could be applied to the hymn, it would not justify the interchange of K and I, for Aristides says distinctly (p. 27) that K and I are a semitone apart. It would only justify the interchange of K and Λ; and that is impossible in the hymn, for K and Λ occur in the same tetrachord, and thus are necessarily of separate pitch.

Your critic is mistaken in supposing that my "theory takes no notice of the difference between fixed and moveable sounds." I have only been arguing that certain notes could not move into the places occupied by others. He makes the same mistake in saying that "according to Mr. Torr, Alypius ought to have given, not two, but at least four different forms for the pycna of Aristoxenus; not to mention those of Ptolemy." Only two forms are needed here. The K Λ M form fits the three cases in Aristoxenus where the pycnon has intervals of a quarter, three-eighths, and a third of a tone respectively; while the I Λ M form fits the fourth case, where the pycnon has intervals of half-a-tone. My contention is not that K and Λ cannot move, but that K cannot move into the place already occupied by I. In other words, I maintain that, while C sharp and D flat would be notes of variable pitch, D flat could never become D natural. This is plainer in the notation for instruments, the signs recurring there in groups of three, F C K , and so forth. My contention is, not that the second and third notes in each group were incapable of moving, but that they could not move far enough to bring the third note of one group into collision with the first note of the next group.

Your critic also says: "By all means let Mr. Torr, if he wishes, consider that the moveable K cannot possibly have coincided with I. He will then have the satisfaction of producing the unmelodious modulation described by Pseudo-Euclid, p. 21." The quotation is misapplied. Pseudo-Euclid is speaking of modulation from one type of music to another by means of a pycnon that occurs in both. The pycnon K Λ M occurs in three other chromatic scales—the upper Phrygian, Dorian, and lower Dorian—and is thus a means of modulation from the Phrygian chromatic scale into any of those three. It could not be a means of modulation from the conjunct to the disjunct system in the Phrygian chromatic scale, as suggested by your critic; for the disjunct system has the pycnon H Θ I, and K Λ M is not converted into that by identifying K with I. The parallel passage in Aristoxenus, p. 72, shows unmistakably that all three notes had to coincide; for it says that the effect was unmelodious, if there was only a coincidence of the highest note in one pycnon and the lowest in the other, or the two highest notes in one pycnon and the two lowest in the other.

This completes my reply on the main question—the accuracy of the transcript. I will deal with the side-issues as briefly as possible.

Mr. Bergholt says that I have "revived Mr. Vincent's theory of the twenty-one Pythagoræan dieses to the octave," and proceeds to ask me a number of questions about that theory. I have never asserted or implied that there were twenty-one Pythagoræan dieseis to the octave. The theory is not mine; and I do not propose to trouble myself about it.

Your critic denies that the Greeks had five-and-forty scales. He says that they had only fifteen, "each of which was submitted to certain modifications." As a matter of fact, Alypius first sets out fifteen diatonic scales, then fifteen chromatic, then fifteen enharmonic. But whether the scales are treated as three groups of fifteen, or fifteen groups of three, the result is precisely the same—there are five-and-forty of them, neither more nor less.

Previously your critic said that a chorus would use the chroma toniaion and leave the chroma malakon and chroma hemiolion to the trained solo singers. And now he quotes a passage from Aristides, p. 19: "the most natural of the genera is the diatonic, which can be sung by all, even by the unlearned; the most artificial, the chroma, which only the learned can sing." That is not to the point. The chroma toniaion was just as much a chroma as the hemiolion or malakon.

Again, your critic says that "in mentioning the diatonic genus generally, our meaning would surely be evident to anyone except Mr. Torr." I pointed out that he was crediting the diatonic genus as a whole with the characteristics of a portion of it. Then he says that "since Mr. Torr does not mention the fact, he is evidently unaware that Ptolemy describes altogether five kinds of diatonic tetrachord." So your critic is pleased to argue that I must be unaware of a fact because I did not mention it when any mention of it would have been irrelevant.

He also says that "the passage in Aristides we referred Mr. Torr to on p. 23 has nothing whatever to do with the notation of Aristides on p. 22, to which we did not refer him." I did not speak of the notation on p. 22. I spoke of the notation on p. 27, which illustrates the passage on p. 23; and I gave the numbers of the pages.

Afterwards he says: "What the difference is between the twelve equal semitones contained in the octave of Aristoxenus and the twelve mean semitones of equal temperament, perhaps Mr. Torr can explain." There were not twelve equal semitones in the octave of Aristoxenus. On pp. 45, 46, Aristoxenus says that a fourth and a fifth together made an octave. Then he says that a tone was the difference between the fourth and the fifth; so his tone was a major tone, not a mean tone. And then he says that the fourth contained two tones and a half. The tones being major tones, the so-called half-tone was (approximately) half-a-minor tone. Hence the octave gave ten semitones of half-a-major tone apiece, and two of very nearly half-a-minor tone apiece.

In what your critic says about the close connection between the Greek system and the scale given by the white keys of the pianoforte, he is tacitly making two assumptions—that the Greeks used equal temperament, and that they had not any intervals but halves and quarters of a tone. Without these assumptions he could not get the pycna to begin on the black and white keys in the manner he describes. The result is curious. He says that the pycna beginning on the white keys take the form 1, 2, 3, while those beginning on the black keys take the form 1, 2, 4. As all the pycna beginning on K take the form 1, 2, 4, he thus identifies K with a black key. But in dealing with the transcript he identifies it with a white key—D natural.

Finally he says: "As to the interval between proslambanomenos (B) and hypate hypaton (C sharp) in the Iastian scale, both notes are fixed at the interval of a tone, and they have nothing to do with a pycnum. The example only serves to demonstrate still further the futility of Mr. Torr's theory." That is a delightful bit of reasoning. He assumes that the tone between these notes is a mean tone, so that if one of them is B, the other will be C sharp in the modern tempered scale. And as that is inconsistent with my theory, he announces that my theory must be false. It is only his assumption that is false.—Yours, &c.,

Cecil Torr.

[We have already answered all Mr. Torr's objections to M. Reinach's transcript of the "Hymn to Apollo" published in our Jubilee number, and shall, therefore, not trouble our readers with a wearisome repetition of the arguments in its favour. The point at issue between Mr. Torr and ourselves is whether the Greeks expressed by their notation the different nuances of tuning used by them in certain portions of their scales, or not. Mr. Torr seems to think that they did, while we consider that, except to a limited extent, chiefly connected with the earlier developments of the enharmonic genus, they did not. From the above letter it appears that Mr. Torr has attempted to meet our objections to his theory so far as to say that "the K A M form fits the three (the italics are ours) cases in Aristoxenus where the pycnon has intervals of a quarter, three-eighths, and a third of a tone respectively; while the I A M form fits the fourth case, where the pycnon has intervals of half-a-tone"; though what grounds he has for this very large assumption we are at a loss to discover, since he gives nothing to show what foundation he has for it. Nothing that Mr. Torr has said has caused us to alter our opinion that M. Reinach's transcript is perfectly correct as regards the notes, and that in all probability the tuning employed was the toniaion; though either of the others is perfectly possible.—Ed., M.T.]

ANCIENT GREEK MUSIC.

To the Editor of "The Musical Times."

Sir,—I observe that Mr. Torr's letter in your last issue incidentally furnishes me with an answer to one of the questions I asked him.

I wanted to know whether his twenty-one intervals were fixed or moveable. We are now told that presumably there was a notation to express every interval in use (p. 555, col. 2), and we are challenged to bring evidence that the twenty-one signs to the octave did not represent twenty-one notes (p. 555, col. 1). I infer, then, that Mr. Torr's contention is that the twenty-one admitted signs did, in fact, represent twenty-one notes, at fixed intervals, which may be determined with accuracy supposing that we have sufficient data.

The whole question now becomes one of arithmetic, and if Mr. Torr will follow me in a little calculation I will show him that, on his theory, the data we have can be made to contradict themselves; in other words, I shall reduce his theory to an absurdity.

The postulates I start from are that in every scale of Alypius the "paramese" is a whole tone ($\frac{9}{8}$) above the "mese," and the "nete diezeugmenon" a perfect fourth ($\frac{4}{3}$) above the "paramese." It is difficult to say just how much Mr. Torr will admit and how much deny; but should he require evidence of the truth of these assertions ample can be adduced. I merely stop to note that I purposely avoid all questions of genera and tuning, the three notes mentioned above being in all cases unsusceptible of variation. Now for my demonstration.

Since O to K is a major tone ($\frac{9}{8}$) (being "mese" and "paramese" in the Ionian scale) and K to H is also a major tone (being "mese" and "paramese" in the Æolian scale), and O to Z is a perfect fourth (being "paramese" and "nete diezeug" in the Hypo-Lydian), it follows, by subtraction of the first two intervals from the third, that H to Z = a Pythagorean limma ($\frac{2^8}{3^4}$).

Again, by parity of reasoning, since H to M and M to I are major tones (Dorian and Phrygian scales) and H to I is a perfect fourth (Hypo-Æolian scale), it follows that I to H also = a Pythagorean limma.

Add together the two limmas thus determined, and we get I to Z = two limmas.

But I to Z = major tone ("mese" and "paramese" in Lydian scale).

But a major tone is known to be greater than two limmas in the proportion (nearly) of 9 : 8. Therefore we have two things at once equal and unequal, which is absurd.

It may be of interest to Mr. Torr to learn that before arriving at a true comprehension of the Greek notation, I myself spent many hours testing the Greek signs in every conceivable way, until at last I fully convinced myself that to give them any fixed ratios was a mathematical impossibility.—Yours faithfully, July 30, 1894. Ernest Bergholt.

To the Editor of "The Musical Times."

Sir,—It is boldly laid down in your impression of July 1 that "it is not a fact that Handel was at any time organist of Whitchurch." The weight that any statement of this sort must have in your influential columns must be my excuse for troubling you on this much-mooted subject.

No doubt there is a difficulty in arriving at the precise nature and extent of Handel's personal connection with Whitchurch at this distance of time; but your contributor takes upon himself to assert a negative. Now, unless he is in the possession of evidence other than that which has been so often put forward in musical and other journals, there is not one iota of proof of the negative to which any person accustomed to deal with questions of fact would attach a feather-weight.

The arguments usually adduced are:—

1. There was a chapel in the house at Canons; Handel probably played there frequently, and, therefore, it is impossible that he played frequently at the church at the other end of the shrubbery.
2. There is an inscription on the organ in the church which says, "Handel composed 'Esther' on this organ"; this is absurd, and therefore other statements bearing on Handel's connection with this organ must be untrue.
3. It is all nonsense, you know, to say that Handel ever played there.

My statement of the objector's reasoning (including No. 3, based apparently on that of the King in "Alice in Wonderland") is really not an exaggeration, and is, I believe, exhaustive; and quite recently provincial papers have seriously inserted matter to this effect. Observe, I do not impute for a moment to your contributor a knowledge of the steps by which his position has been arrived at; he has doubtless simply heard the conclusion without the premises, or he would not have adopted them.

Why should the existence of the chapel, and the (assumed) probability that Handel played there, interfere with the possibility (this is all I am now dealing with) of his having often played services at the church? They may have been at totally different hours so as not to clash. As far as I have seen the evidence, there is no more proof of his regular performance on the Gosport organ in the chapel than there is of his performance at the church.

It is sufficient with reference to No. 2 to point out the looseness of thought which can urge that any fancied absurdity in the inscription affords the faintest shadow of a presumption that the tradition is false irrespective of the inscription.

The onus of proof is no doubt on those who say Handel played at Whitchurch; but there is some proof of this, and such as a judge would lay before the jury—viz., an unbroken tradition for many years on the spot. He would also tell them to consider the probability arising from the peculiar organ and orchestra placed there for some abnormal performances, the presence of Handel, and the contemporaneous statements of poets pointing to such performances in the church (as opposed to the chapel). This is what lawyers call a primâ facie case, liable no doubt to be disproved. You can only go on probabilities in many cases. Your readers might not feel disposed to risk much money on the affirmative; but who would stake one farthing on the arguments urged in support of the foregone conclusion contra?—I remain, Sir, yours truly,

Edward Cutler.

12, Old Square, Lincoln's Inn, W.C.

[The brass plate with the statement "Handel was organist of this church from the year 1718 to 1721" is very precise, and is either true or false; if the former, there should be no difficulty in producing proofs. The plate was put on the organ in 1834 by Julius Plumer, Esq., of Canons Park, the great-uncle, I believe, of Mr. Cutler; and as the latter resides at Whitchurch, doubtless it will afford him gratification to search the Parish records. Should he find any verification of the inscription he will do justice to his relative's memory and silence unbelievers by publishing the same. The Register of burials of St. Lawrence, Whitchurch, contains the following entry: "Buried, 6th of June, 1772, William Powell, organist." Was not this William Powell organist during the time that Handel was engaged by the Duke of Chandos in his private chapel at Canons? When was Powell appointed and whom did he succeed?—Ed., M.T.]

P.S.—I have now, in accordance with your excellent suggestion, searched the archives of Whitchurch from 1687, the courteous custodian having aided me in my scrutiny. There is no reference to the post of organist or to the church music until the engagement of one Edward Frith, in 1796. If there had been, however, such reference it would have been consistent with my proposition. I do not suggest that Handel tremulously presented testimonials to the enlightened vestrymen of the period, and after triumphantly beating the sexton's daughter by a neck, played Tate and Brady in all weathers for 7s. 6d. per Sabbath. My suggestion is that the chances are fifty to one that when the Duke went to the church, as he did according to the objectors' own authorities, the august denizens of the luxurious private boxes which had been fitted up at great cost for the Canons guests and household, would not have been satisfied without the presence at the organ of the giant whom his grace kept tame on the premises. I am well aware that in the able article in the Leisure Hour (Nov., 1875) it is suggested that Handel never lived at all at Canons; but I do not understand that Mr. Cummings, who probably has the literature on the subject more at his finger-ends than anyone, takes this view.—E. C.

H. H. PIERSON'S "FAUST."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Mr. F. Corder, in his Lecture at the Royal Academy on the history of the "Musical treatment of the 'Faust' Legend," as reported in your valuable journal, makes some statements which it would be unjust to the memory of a great artist to allow to pass unchallenged. Anyone who knows H. H. Pierson's second part of "Faust" music will marvel that any instructed and fairly intelligent musician can find—as Mr. Corder does—"an extravagant and incoherent style in the music. Phrases appear and disappear, have no counterpart or continuation, and the rhythm and tune are frequently changed without apparent object." In reply to this statement I would ask anyone, unprejudiced, to play over the Overture, with its well-defined themes, magnificently worked out, and coherent resumé of the different motifs of the work; the solo of Ariel and chorus of Fairies, full to repletion of the most enchanting music; the Intermezzo, No. 16, coherent, to an artistic spirit throughout, and only extravagant in its wealth of beauty; the divine chorus "Sound, immortal harp," a vision of beauty, unmarred by one note that can possibly be called "obscure"; the dignified Te Deum; the Introduction to Act V., with its charming blending of organ and orchestra; the "Song of the Warder," which evidently produced a great effect at Mr. Corder's Lecture, and no wonder, when one sees the clearness and subtle beauty of the music; and what words can be found to describe the marvellous choruses of Angels and Beautified Spirits? I will not lay myself open to the charge of being "extravagant," and will therefore leave each real artist who may examine this music to decide for himself.

I would, in conclusion, ask Mr. Corder to tell us who has shown Edouard Lassen's music to "Faust" to be "the most complete and satisfactory incidental music yet provided for the drama"?

As opposed to this statement stands out the broad fact that Pierson's "Faust" is constantly performed in Germany, and there considered the only satisfactory music suited to the drama. H. H. Pierson has expressed in the eloquent language of music what he knew Goethe meant to say, though from the comparative imperfection of human language he could only shadow it forth in words; and thus Pierson has done the exact opposite of what Wagner vainly attempted to do—viz., make music speak human language, not express ideas in her own wondrously eloquent language.—Yours faithfully,

July 20, 1894. Theodore S. Hill.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Your correspondent, whose letter you have courteously submitted to me, says that he "will leave each real artist who may examine Pierson's music to decide for himself" as to its merits, but he objects to my expression of opinion. In spite of the implied snub, I fear, however, that I cannot alter it, and my opinion is not that of an anonymous and therefore powerful critic, but a conscientious musician whose words and deeds are known to all men, and are taken for what they are worth.

Admire Pierson who will, I again assert that if ever music was incoherent his was, that his Overture to "Faust" contains no "magnificent working" of its ill-assorted phrases, that the Ariel chorus is to me unintelligible, the Intermezzo clear but weak in the joints, the chorus, "Sound, immortal harp," a feeble affair, with its bass helplessly struggling to keep away from the dominant and failing—in fact, the only point on which I can agree with Mr. Hill is that no words can describe the choruses of Angels and Beautified Spirits. I will freely grant that Pierson expressed what he knew Goethe meant to say, but almost any contemporary opera affords proof that a man may "make music speak human language" and yet produce uncommonly bad music for all that.

As to Lassen's "Faust" music, a glance at the score will reveal the fact that it is more complete and suitable for stage performance than any other. As to its æsthetic value, I cannot call it absolutely first-rate, but it is very good.

Is your correspondent within the facts when he states that Pierson's music is constantly performed in Germany?

Faithfully yours,

F. CORDER.

PURCELL'S ORGAN AND HARPSICHORD MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Dr. Hopkins and I have undertaken to edit a volume of Purcell's Organ and Harpsichord Music for the complete edition of the composer's works now being published by the Purcell Society. As it is very possible that manuscripts which we do not know are in private collections, we shall be extremely obliged if the owners of any such compositions will communicate with us. The greatest care will be taken of any MSS. with which we are entrusted, and after they have been copied they shall be at once returned.

All communications should be addressed to me at the British Museum.—Believe me, yours obediently,

WM. BARCLAY SQUIRE,
Hon. Sec., Purcell Society.

"WHEN DOCTORS DIFFER."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The point raised by your correspondent in your July number as to the true meaning of the terms con sordini and its converse senza sordini is an important one to teachers of the pianoforte. There can be no doubt that, as used in modern pianoforte music, they can apply only to the left or piano pedal. I believe that Beethoven intended this use of the direction senza sordini in the first movement of the so-called "Moonlight" Sonata, as, in the last movement, he uses the sign "Ped. ✱" in several places to produce a certain effect on the two chords there written. It is interesting to note that the term sordino, implying deafness, which is somewhat the effect produced by the veiling of the sound, whether produced by the pianoforte or an orchestral instrument, should have been rendered in English by a word signifying dumbness—i.e., "mute," this being just the effect produced by the dampers of the pianoforte, which stop the vibrations at once. The first attempt to vary the tone of the pianoforte was by means of stops at the player's left hand to raise the dampers, these being afterwards transferred to a pedal. The terms con sordini and senza sordini were then first applied to the contrivance. Later the piano, or soft pedal, was introduced to veil or mute the sounds, and then, as is most probable, the terms were transferred to the new pedal, and the now familiar directions, "Ped. ✱," applied to the right, or damper pedal. That this is so seems to be borne out by a reference to three Sonatas by Steibelt, published in 1799 (three years before Beethoven published his Op. 27), in which both pedals are provided with special marks for their use.

It is certainly to be regretted that the recognised manuals and text-books should give such contrary definitions of well-used terms, but the "Text-Book of Musical Knowledge" authorised by Trinity College has undoubtedly the right view of the subject.—Yours faithfully,

JAMES W. WALLIS.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ADELAIDE, AUSTRALIA.—The Oratorio Festival held during the week ending July 4 in the Jubilee Exhibition Buildings proved a great success. The works performed were Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Sullivan's "Golden Legend," Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and excerpts from "Samson," "Judas Maccabæus," and "Eli"—a selection it would be difficult to equal in popularity. An excellent chorus, numbering about 350 voices, was admirably accompanied by an able orchestra led by Mr. Heinicke, and the solos were effectively sung by Madame Emily Spada, Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Philip Newbury, and Mr. Charles Magrath. Mr. A. Wyatt Mortimer presided at the organ and Mr. C. J. Stevens conducted. The success of this Festival would suggest the establishment in Australia of similar performances on the lines adopted in the musical centres of the mother country.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Mr. Dan Godfrey, jun., whose band continues to attract large numbers to the Winter Gardens, is about to establish a Choral Society, which will give oratorio performances during the winter months. This Society will fill a long-felt want in Bournemouth, where opportunities of hearing great choral works, adequately rendered, have hitherto been few and far between.

CHIGWELL.—At the Concert given in the Grammar School on Speech Day, July 31, the vocal part of the programme was entirely made up of compositions by English living writers. Mr. Henry Riding conducted and furnished incidental music to the English and Greek speeches.

CHRISTCHURCH, NEW ZEALAND.—The Liedertafel gave their fiftieth Concert on May 31, in Tuam Street Hall. In addition to an excellent selection of glees and part-songs, which were admirably sung by the Society, Messrs. Barnett, Weir, Mannering, and Millar gave a spirited rendering of Kücken's "Young Musicians," and solos were sung by Mr. T. H. Barnett, Mr. Millar, Mr. H. Weir, Mr. Newman, and Mr. Barkas. The programme also contained Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Benedictus," which was effectively played by Mr. F. M. Wallace, and two movements from a Haydn Quartet, rendered by Miss Beath, Miss Gordon-Rich, Mr. Wallace, and Mr. Loughnan.——On June 7 Mr. Wallace gave the first of his second series of Chamber Concerts, in the Art Gallery. The programme comprised quartets by Haydn and Rheinberger, the former played by Mr. Wallace, Miss Beath, Miss Gordon-Rich, and Mr. H. H. Loughnan; and the latter by Mrs. Wilding, Mr. Wallace, Miss Rich, and Mr. Loughnan. The concert-giver's abilities as a violinist were shown in Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Highland Ballad," and Mrs. Wilding's skill as a pianist was well displayed in a suite for pianoforte and violin by Emile Bernard. The vocalists were Mrs. Burns and Mr. F. Barkas, whose singing was greatly appreciated. Mr. Trist Searell was an admirable accompanist.——The first of a proposed series of Concerts was successfully given on June 7, in the Theatre Royal, by Messrs. F. R. Woodhouse, A. Millar, and C. Edgar. These gentlemen sang a number of favourite songs, and received vocal assistance from Mrs. C. Edgar, Mr. R. Halley, and Mr. H. Empson. Miss T. Bush contributed a pianoforte solo and Mr. F. W. Moss played "Melodie Parisienne" on the flute. Recitations were given by Miss McNeish and and Mr. Ryan. ——The same evening, Mr. Fuller presented an excellent programme to an appreciative audience in the Tuam Street Theatre. His singing was much enjoyed, and he received able assistance from Master Fuller, Miss Fanny Martin, Miss Packer, Mr. Dryland, and Mr. H. Rossiter's Septet Orchestra.——The second Concert of the Musical Union, since its formation by the amalgamation of the Musical and Amateur Orchestral Societies, was held on June 22, in the Tuam Street Hall. The programme comprised Schubert's "Song of Miriam," Gade's cantata "The Erl-King's Daughter," a selection from the same composer's "Psyche," and the Andante from Haydn's "Clock" Symphony. Miss Mabel Bell, Miss Davie, and Mr. H. Weir were the soloists, and Mr. Wallace was the Conductor. The chorus sang with admirable effect, and the orchestra had to repeat the movement from the Symphony.

Flint.—The annual Musical Service of the united choirs of St. Mary's, St. David's, St. Thomas's, and St. Catherine's churches was celebrated on the 8th ult., in St. Mary's Church. Gadsby's setting in D was used for the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, and the anthem was Mee Pattison's "Praise the Lord," the duet in the latter being sung by Mrs. A. N. Roberts and Miss F. Jones, and the quartet by Mrs. Bellis, Mr. Bellis, Mr. J. O. Jones, and Mr. R. Jones. Mr. E. J. H. Williams, Organist of St. Mary's, conducted; and Miss Dyson played the organ accompaniments.

Hanley.—During the month the Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society has held its Annual Meeting, and the usual report of the season's work was presented to a very large attendance of members. Mr. R. Bates (secretary) said that the Concerts had reduced the balance in hand from previous efforts, but the membership had increased and the work of the Society had not suffered. The programme for the coming season includes a performance of "The Messiah" at Christmas, with Miss Monk, Madame Dews, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. John Ridding, as soloists. The financial result shows a loss of about £60 upon the two Concerts of the year. Mr. Bates was presented with an illuminated address and a China tea service on vacating the post of secretary, and a presentation was also made to the financial secretary (Mr. C. L. Forrester), who, through pressure of business engagements, also tendered his resignation. The choir is now rehearsing glees and madrigals for the first Concert early in October.——At the Bethesda Chapel, on July 29, the Prize Choir sang the Manchester Competition tests, under the direction of Mr. J. Garner (Choirmaster).

Llandudno.—The second Orchestral Service of the season was held at Holy Trinity Church, on July 29, and attracted a large congregation. The music performed included an anthem, "Abide with me," composed for the occasion by the Organist, Mr. R. H. Whall, and Garrett's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F, scored for organ and orchestra by Mr. Whall. At the conclusion of the service the "Hallelujah" chorus from "The Messiah" was sung. The orchestra consisted of thirteen members of Rivière's Orchestra (strings, brass, and drums), and Mr. Reed, of the Pier Orchestra, gave valuable assistance at the organ. Mr. Whall conducted.

Oxford.—At the Summer Meeting of the University Extension an Organ Recital was given, on the 4th ult., in the Sheldonian Theatre, by Dr. J. Varley Roberts, Organist of Magdalen College. An exceptionally interesting programme included the following pieces: Overture to "Ptolemy" (Handel), Præludium et Fuga, in C minor (Book II.) (J. S. Bach), Specimens of the Music of the 17th Century—viz., Fantazia, of foure parts, in A minor (Orlando Gibbons), Sellenger's Round in C (Byrd), Ground in G (John Blow), Air and Chorus, "Come if you dare" ("King Arthur") and Overture to "Bonduca" (Purcell), Te Deum Patrem colimus (B. Rogers), Corant in E minor (Lulli), Preludio, Allemanda, and Giga in F (Corelli), and the Allegretto and Allegro Maestoso e Vivace in B flat from Mendelssohn's Fourth Organ Sonata.——At the Inaugural Meeting of the British Association, on the 8th ult., in the Sheldonian Theatre, Dr. Roberts played the following selection: Sinfonia in B flat from "Saul" (Handel), Allegro in F (Corelli), Andante and Allegro in D (Bache), and Fuga in E flat, "St. Ann's" (Bach).

Salisbury.—The conductors of the Salisbury Philharmonic Society and the Salisbury Vocal Union (Mr. Alfred Foley and Mr. J. M. Hayden) have already made arrangements for the coming season, which they will open next month at the County Hall. The Sarum Choral Society, which will again be conducted by Mr. Frank Bartlett, will shortly commence rehearsals; but as yet no definite selection has been made of a work for performance at the Christmas Concert.

Sheffield.—Mr. Rousbey's Opera Company gave an effective performance of "Cavalleria Rusticana" on the 21st ult., in the City Theatre. The principal characters were sustained by Mdlle. Amelia Sinico, Miss M. Leverentz, Miss J. Hellaby, Mr. Dudley Buck, jun., and Mr. Rousbey.

Wirksworth.—The annual Choral Festival was celebrated in the Parish Church on the 15th ult., when choirs from the following parishes took part:—Alfreton, Bakewell, Cromford, Duffield, Middleton, Wirksworth, and St. Werburgh. Mr. Smith, of Derby, conducted.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. George G. Beale, Organist and Choirmaster to Llandaff Cathedral.—Mr. Martin Fallas Shaw, Organist and Choirmaster to Emanuel Parish Church, West Hampstead.—Mr. J. H. Cornish, Organist and Choirmaster to Ewell Parish Church.—Mr. R. Bareham, Organist to Lynton Parish Church.—Mr. R. Glendining, Organist to Buckland (Devon) Parish Church. —Mr. Carolus King, Organist to City Road Congregational Church.—Mr. T. W. Brooks, Organist to St. Botolph's, Cambridge.—Mr. James Duddle, Organist and Choirmaster to the Presbyterian Church, Withington, Manchester.

Choir Appointments.—Mr. Frederick Billett (Alto), to St. Jude's, South Kensington.—Mr. William Nash Cook (Principal Tenor), to St. Peter's, Great Windmill Street.

UNA

FOR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

VERSE BY

FREDERICK ENOCH

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

PERFORMANCE IN THE PUBLIC HALL, IPSWICH, JANUARY 16, 1894.

"'Una' has been so recently described and criticised that there is no necessity for detailed reference to the composition. Roughly speaking, it is founded upon the story of 'Una and the Lion' as told in the 'Faërie Queene,' amplified in verse of unusual excellence by Mr. Frederick Enoch, and full of romantic incident which commends itself to picturesque musical expression . . . possesses in a marked degree the great charms of tunefulness and vivacity. It is above all things an understandable Cantata—not one of those crabbed and crooked things which no ordinary person can understand. The most striking and romantic number is undoubtedly the chorus 'Hark! the Angelus is calling,' in which the campanels used at Norwich (manufactured by Messrs. Martineau and Smith, of Birmingham) were introduced. It is free and comparatively simple in style, but full of poetic melody, recalling by a flash of association that famous and familiar picture of 'The Angelus.' This was admirably given, and the choruses throughout, indeed, 'went' with great spirit and precision, reflecting much credit upon those engaged, and upon Mr. Dalby's efforts as leader in preparing for the Concert. The swinging chorus, 'Let's hasten on,' was loudly encored. A similar compliment was paid to all four soloists for their best efforts—to Mr. Henry Piercy for the song, 'Shine, vestal star'; to Miss Croft for the taking solo, 'The enchanter's wand,' which should become a popular excerpt; to Miss Rose Long, who did full and sympathetic justice to the charming song, 'O love will love,' and to Mr. Daniel Price for his rendering of 'A Palmer, met upon my way.' At the close, the performance as a whole was loudly applauded by the well-pleased audience. The composer himself conducted, and was most heartily welcomed as he came to the front of the platform."—East Anglian Daily Times.

"To the list of works which have proved widely acceptable, 'Una' should be added, for the flow of pleasant unaffected tune and the simple and suave part-writing are just as noteworthy as in 'The Holy City' and 'Joan of Arc.'"—Athenæum.

"Has made its way wherever heard. . . . Full of the melodious tuneful spirit which breathes in all Mr. Gaul's work, and will add yet another leaf to the wreath which has crowned the efforts of the masterly composer of the 'Holy City' and other works."—Putney Borough News.

"'Una' differs considerably from some of the earlier works of Mr. Gaul. Mr. Frederick Enoch is the capable librettist, and in setting his words to music, Mr. Gaul has scored another marked success."—Nelson Chronicle.

"Mr. Gaul's music is, as usual with him, replete with spontaneous melody. The soprano solo, 'O love will love,' is really a delicious piece of writing."—Manchester Examiner.

"Mr. Gaul's choral writing is always fluent and pleasing, and this is fast becoming something to be thankful for."—Leeds Mercury.

"Is in keeping with Mr. Gaul's previous works. . . . Contains some beautiful numbers, especially the Angelus chorus, with the campanel introduction."—South-Western World.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer, living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

THE TONIC SOL-FA FESTIVAL.

"Mr. Gaul's latest work is another proof of his practical wisdom as well as of his ability as a composer. We welcome 'Israel in the Wilderness' as one of those works which foster the love and induce the practice of music amongst the people."—Musical Standard.

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra, with Mr. A. J. Eyre as organist. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

"Altogether worthy of the composer of that amazingly popular work 'The Holy City.'"—The Referee.

"The Cantata contains all the elements of popularity, and it was excellently performed under the composer's direction, and very warmly received."—Standard.

"The part-writing is excellent. . . . Melodious throughout. There is sufficient variety to prevent any feeling of monotony. . . . At its close the composer was heartily cheered."—Daily News.

"Without being unduly difficult, it is indisputably effective."—London Figaro.

"At the close of the work, portions of which were loudly applauded, Mr. Gaul, who conducted, was warmly complimented on a Cantata which is likely to become quite as great a favourite with choral societies as 'The Holy City' and other of his compositions."—Daily Chronicle.

"Characterised by the same refinement as that of Mr. Gaul's extremely successful work 'The Holy City.'"—The Athenæum.

"We may say at once that the music is characterised by Mr. Gaul's usual felicity of treatment. Mr. Gaul had every reason to be gratified with the performance and reception of his Cantata, and he may expect to hear of many more performances."—Musical Times.

"Musicianly and excellent, and not too difficult to imperil its popularity."—Musical Opinion.

"One of the most musicianly, melodious, and well conceived works of its popular composer."—School Music Review.

THE TEN VIRGINS

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES AND CHORUS

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

(Op. 42.)

COMPOSER OF "THE HOLY CITY," "RUTH," "PASSION SERVICE," "JOAN OF ARC," &c.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"The Cantata is replete with charming music of that school which every one can appreciate, and which found so distinguished a master in Mendelssohn. If composers would have their works popular with choral societies, it is only reasonable to expect that they will bestow a fair share of their attention upon the choruses. The old masters knew this, and there is no doubt that the fact has much to do with the long-continued popularity of their works; and there is equally little doubt, we think, that the principal cause of the failure of so many works produced now-a-days is the uninteresting nature of the choruses. Compare the choruses of the three most popular works ever produced—'The Messiah,' 'Creation,' and 'Elijah'—with a large number of modern works, and our meaning will be clear. If we mistake not, such thoughts as these passed through Mr. Gaul's mind when he set himself to compose those works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—'The Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins'—and that the public endorse his views is proved by the enormous sale which these works have had."—Newcastle Daily Journal, Dec. 17, 1890.

"The subject is an excellent one for a Cantata . . . a stronger work than 'Joan of Arc.' . . . Melodious, vocal, and of moderate difficulty, and, like Mr. Gaul's earlier Cantatas, will be eagerly welcomed by societies in search of new works having these characteristics."—Newcastle Daily Leader, Dec. 16, 1890.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—"The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. If the verdict of a miscellaneous audience, that could have no possible reason for being favourably prejudiced, is of any account in estimating the merit of a new work, a career that will rival that of the same composer's 'Holy City' may be predicted for 'The Ten Virgins.' That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works, is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."—Musical Times, Dec. 1, 1890.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

The above Cantata has been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral, including three numbers for Sopranos and Contraltos (The Virgins).

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal parts, each 1s. Words only, 5s. per 100.

Staff Edition. Sixteenth to Twentieth Thousand.

JOAN OF ARC

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

OF THE

AT

BY

C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

The attention which has of late years been given by our Universities to the cultivation of music, and the endeavour to again make the degrees of Doctor and Bachelor in that faculty of substantial value, as marks of real musical erudition and culture on the part of the holder, as was formerly the case, have induced me to try and investigate the early history of these degrees which are peculiar to the English Universities, and are practically unknown abroad.

I have traced the course of the degrees from the earliest time they are mentioned to the present day, when the tendency becomes more and more marked to place music on a level in every respect with the other faculties.

RUTH

A HARVEST PASTORAL

EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy reapers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventful episode lends itself to a pathetic, picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved and sorrowful trio of women on whom the calamity of poverty and famine has fallen, as if to give intensity to their greater grief, and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal benevolence displayed by the mighty Boaz, who so quickly transforms sorrow into joy, are all introduced and aptly take their allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Citizen.

"The work, like the 'Holy City,' is full of beautiful orchestral passages, while the vocal score abounds with charming numbers."—Bucks Herald.

"'Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. . . . The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject."—Bradford Observer.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"'Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. . . . It contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

PERFORMED IN THE TOWN HALL, BIRMINGHAM, ON TWELVE OCCASIONS.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s.; ditto, paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 4s.

THE CATHEDRAL PARAGRAPH PSALTER

CONTAINING THE

CANTICLES, PSALMS, AND PROPER PSALMS

TOGETHER WITH

EDITED BY THE

REV. J. TROUTBECK, D.D.

(Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, and Minor Canon of Westminster).

PRICE THREE SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE.

The principle of Pointing followed is that of the Cathedral Psalter, with slight modifications here and there, suggested by experience, in the treatment of individual verses. For the accents which are used in the Cathedral Psalter to indicate the beginning of the bar of duple time, which connects the free recitation with the metrical part of the chant, are substituted super-imposed musical notes, in accordance with the principle set forth in the Preface to the Cathedral Psalter, so as to indicate exactly, in every verse throughout the Psalter, the best method of dividing the bar into the component parts of a semibreve. Other means also have been adopted to ensure clearness and promote facility.

Prefixed to the new Psalter is a Scheme of Chants and some brief Notes on the History of the Psalter and the Characteristics of each Psalm.

MISS
FANNY DE BOUFFLERS
(SOPRANO)
For Oratorios, Cantatas, Concerts, Operatic Recitals, &c.

"The Scottish Orchestra" (Mr. Georg Henschel, Conductor).—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers contributed much to the enjoyment of the audience. She refused an encore (thrice recalled) for a rendering of the Handelian Air 'Let the bright Seraphim,' but on again being enthusiastically recalled after singing "Should he upbraid," repeated a portion of it."—Glasgow Mail.

"Miss Fanny de Boufflers sang 'Should he upbraid' with a piquancy and brightness which suited the number admirably. The audience was thoroughly pleased, and insisted on a repetition, to which the artist was finally persuaded."—Glasgow Herald.

Cherubini's "O fons amoris."—"A most excellent rendering was given of Cherubini's 'O fons amoris.' The very exacting solo (ranging from C to C in Alt) was splendidly executed by Miss Fanny de Boufflers, whose extensive range and fine method were therein displayed to the greatest advantage. The work is one of the composer's six greater Motets. The intrinsic difficulty of the solo soprano, requiring the extraordinary range of two whole octaves, renders the performance of the work a great rarity."—Liverpool Daily Post.

Rossini's "Stabat Mater."—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers' interpretation of the 'Inflammatus' was at once prayerful and most artistic, and well worthy of her high reputation as an exponent of sacred music."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Elijah" (Cambrian Choral Society).—"Miss Fanny de Boufflers sang the heavy work which is allotted to the soprano with sympathy, fervour, and dramatic fire throughout."—Birkenhead Advertiser.

City Hall Concert, Glasgow.—"Signor Foli and party attracted an immense audience. . . . Signor Foli sang the duet with Miss Fanny de Boufflers, 'La Dove Prende' (Mozart). Miss de Boufflers appeared once before this season at these concerts, and her performances on Saturday night more than confirmed, they greatly increased the highly favourable impression she made on the former occasion. The selections she gave were admirably fitted to show the rich, full and flexible quality of her voice."—North British Daily Mail.

"A soprano of very considerable worth, receiving a most emphatic demonstration of appreciation from her hearers."—Glasgow Herald.

"Powerful and clear soprano voice."—Northern Daily Telegraph.

"Whose vocalisation was artistic and refined."—Western Daily Press, Bristol.

"Powerful soprano, . . . considerable natural talent."—Manchester Guardian.

"Possesses a bright, pure soprano voice."—Walsall Observer.

"An artist of decided abilities."—Waterford Star.

"Remarkably sweet and powerful soprano."—Cork Herald.

"Has a well-trained, pure and beautiful voice."—Harrogate Advertiser.

"Was a great success, . . . received with unbounded applause."—Dublin Evening Telegraph.

LILLIE WORMALD
(SOPRANO)
At liberty for Concerts, Oratorios, Operatic Recitals, At Homes, &c.

"More than a passing word of praise is due to Miss Lillie Wormald. Her execution of David's 'Couplets du Mysoli' was excellent, the light, graceful French characteristics of the air being admirably caught and expressed."—Manchester Courier, February 1, 1894.

Opening of the Leeds College of Music.—"The sympathies of the audience had been fully drawn upon by the singing of Miss Lillie Wormald, a young lady whom we do not remember to have heard before, but who is evidently destined to make a considerable reputation for herself. Her voice, a light soprano of highly agreeable quality, has been manifestly cultivated in a good school. Her cultured style and accuracy of intonation were especially noticeable in David's 'Couplets du Mysoli,' the rendering of which fully merited the designation of 'charming' applied to it by Sir Joseph Barnby. Nor did the piquant extract 'Mia Piccirella,' from Gomes's 'Salvator Rosa,' lack any contributory element of success."—Leeds Mercury, June 19, 1894.

"Miss Lillie Wormald contributed several songs in a clever and highly appreciated manner."—Yorkshire Post, June 21, 1894.

For terms, &c., address, 14, Acomb Street, Greenheys, Manchester.

(CONTRALTO)
(Late Westmorland Scholar and Parepa-Rosa Gold Medalist of the Royal Academy of Music)
Is at liberty for Concerts of every description.

"This reference to the vocalist leads us on to say that Miss Marie Hooton, Westmorland Scholar and Gold Medalist of the Royal Academy of Music, has been specially engaged, and whatever good opinions she succeeded in creating on her last visit, the manner in which she acquitted herself on Wednesday certainly afforded the highest satisfaction. If we give Miss Hooton the honour of first mention, it is not that we desire to depreciate the instrumental performers, but rather because of her uniform excellence, and the undoubted fact that, to a large proportion of the audience, her fine singing was one of the most attractive features of the evening. In Part I. Miss Hooton made her opening bow to the house in Mozart's song 'The Violet,' and her beautiful contralto voice, coupled with a distinct and pleasing articulation, at once made her a popular and acceptable vocalist. Her second effort, in the scena 'Ombra felice,' was even more impressive, and though rendered in a language not generally 'understanded of the people,' she sang with so much power and fervour—with a true artistic feeling, indeed, which displayed to advantage a voice full of richness and remarkable for its agreeable tone—that the audience were raised to the highest enthusiasm and an encore had to be conceded, whereupon the song 'Come to me' was substituted and rendered with much taste and vivacity. In the latter part of the programme Miss Hooton sang 'To Chloe' and 'Non so più' ('Figaro'), and both were effective in the extreme. She combines with a pure voice a pleasing and faithful interpretation of her theme, and the delight of the audience was in no sense a matter of surprise. In response to most cordial encores, 'She wandered down the mountain side' (Clay) and 'Annie Laurie' were given and proved equally successful, the popular verdict manifested by the hearty applause being thoroughly deserved."

Please address, 37, Torrington Square, Bloomsbury.

Press Notices.

"Acquitted herself like an artist in the contralto music." (South London Choral Association, "Elijah," third engagement.)—South London Mail, November 18, 1893.

"Madame Eliza Thomas, now an established favourite here . . . sweet, full voice was heard to great advantage." ("Messiah," eighth engagement, Chelmsford Choral.)—Essex Chronicle, December 15, 1893.

"Was received with enthusiasm, is gifted with vocal powers of a high order." (Louth Choral, sixth engagement, "Judas.")—Advertiser, December 23, 1893.

"Madame Thomas is a favourite in the city, and she gained loud and merited applause." (Seventh engagement.)—Winchester Observer, May 20, 1893.

"The Organist was most happy in having secured the assistance of Madame Eliza Thomas, an artist possessing a delightful contralto voice, cultivated to a high degree. She rendered the sacred solos with much sympathy and intelligence, and her performances were enhanced by the breadth and richness of her vocal organ."—West Herts Post, April 14, 1893.

"The exquisite quality of her voice and refined style has certainly established her a favourite here."—West Herts Post, December 24, 1893.

Dr. Joachim's Concerts.—"Miss Lilian Hovey . . . opened Meyerbeer's cavatina, 'Nobil Signor,' with good, full, tone; and she maintained this to the end of the piece. It was her best effort of the evening, and well deserved the flattering encore which was accorded to her."—Sheffield Independent, February 14, 1894.

"Elijah."—Miss Hovey's finished style was manifested in 'Woe unto them' and 'O rest in the Lord,' which she rendered very beautifully and with rare devotional expression and pathos."—Sheffield Telegraph, April 15, 1893.

Having returned to England after a long and successful career, is now booking Engagements for Miscellaneous and Oratorio Concerts.

"Mr. Tom Burgin, who sang Ciro Pinsuti's 'I fear no foe,' is one of the finest baritones ever heard in this city. His voice is full and perfectly under command, and the way in which he rang out the defiant tones of his song last night was something to be remembered."—Melbourne Argus.

"In the soul-stirring song, 'The Bay of Biscay,' he was most vociferously encored, and, in spite of two recalls, he was compelled to repeat the last verse, which gave unlimited satisfaction to the audience."—Sydney Morning Herald.

"Mr. T. Burgin has in his voice and manner the conditions of success, and only needs to be known to be appreciated in this wider artistically, but, geographically narrower, tight little island. His songs were well chosen to display his varied powers, his first appearance being made in an Australian song, 'Imperfectus,' by Sir W. C. F. Robinson, Governor of Western Australia. This proved a most interesting composition and was enthusiastically received."—Northern Echo.

"In Mr. T. Burgin Mons. Speelman has found a really splendid baritone, and Mons. Speelman was so delighted with Mr. Burgin's singing that he shook hands with him on the stage in a complimentary manner. Mr. Burgin has met with all the success he merited, and his next appearance will be anxiously awaited for."—Blackpool Times.

THE MUSIC HALL OF THE FUTURE.

It is to be feared that the discussions which from time to time have been carried on in the Press, musical and otherwise, as to the merits of the modern music hall have suffered, as so often happens in similar controversies, from the intemperate polemical methods of the rival partisans. The champion of high art, on the one hand, is not always free from the taint of priggishness. Dr. Stanford once introduced an airy trifle by Strauss (not Richard) at one of the orchestral concerts at the Royal College of Music, and the happy audacity of the innovation excited great resentment and even hisses amongst a certain section of the audience. We merely mention this incident as illustrative of the no-compromise temper which, so far from mending matters, only widens the gulf between Philistinism and Culture. The tyranny of earnestness is to be deprecated as much as the unbridled dominion of frivolity. And it is precisely this uncompromising attitude which, in some cases, has interfered with the otherwise admirable efforts of benevolent amateurs to bring good music home to the million. You must not bombard the East-ender with Brahms and Beethoven straight off, but you must introduce the classical element at first homœopathically, and afterwards in larger quantities. And a similar policy, in the long run, is no doubt better calculated to eliminate the element of imbecility and vulgarity from the music halls than the wholesale condemnation of the entire system, so freely indulged in by certain fastidious and sensitive critics. On the other hand, the extravagant adulation bestowed of late years by certain writers in certain journals on the achievements of the variety artist, and the prodigious success, social as well as financial, which has attended the new-found cult of the coster, explain and extenuate, if they do not justify the bitter feeling displayed by the advocates of legitimate art in their onslaughts on the modern music hall system. It is not too much to say that an amount of fulsome eulogy has been lavished on the divettes of the music hall, and that too in respectably conducted papers, which would not be tolerated for one moment if it had been applied to the most distinguished artists of the concert-room. And the worst of it is that this tremendous "booming" of the variety artist has not been the work of incompetent hack writers, but has in great measure proceeded from the pens of practised and even accomplished scribes, the influence of whose criticism is often enhanced by its purely literary quality. It was one of these gentlemen, not so very long ago, who alluded to a divinity of the "Halls" as "an inspired artist," and it was in the same journal that Jenny Lind's claim to a memorial in the Abbey was strenuously combated. Well, these incidents and this temper certainly do not make it easier to obtain a dispassionate survey of the pros and cons of the great music hall question.

There is an excellent old saying: "Fas est et ab hoste doceri." It is always pretty safe to depend on the self-criticism of an antagonist, and those fastidious amateurs who have refused to bow the knee before the great goddess Variety may take not a little comfort and consolation from the admissions of some of her most faithful votaries. Assiduous worship at her shrine has revealed the existence of flaws in the golden image, even to their adoring eyes, and already something like a wail has begun to go up that the music hall is not all that it should be from an artistic point of view; that its inspired artists are forsaking their high ideals, that individuality of treatment is giving way to "anæmic vulgarity," and that the attitude of the audience, with its craving for "decency and domesticity," is ruining the halls artistically. More than that, we are assured by the same authority that ballad vocalists almost beneath contempt are sure of welcome if they only sing something tuneful, or, more correctly, something "tuney." These, and other charges, much of the same calibre, are laid at the door of music hall performers and audiences, and, no doubt, in the estimation of the critic who formulates them, they constitute a very formidable indictment. And the reason of it all is that the audiences are mainly middle class, and that they harbour an ineradicable regard for respectability. Now when one reads a jeremiad of this description over the shortcomings of the middle classes, one is moved to sympathise with the spirited confession of a personage in a recently published novel who observes: "I'm afraid I'm hopelessly middle-class, the most despised class in England to judge by novels. Everybody writes about Dukes and Duchesses, or else of heroes and heroines out of the slums. We poor people who inhabit 'villa residences,' and keep two or three servants, have scarcely a soul to be saved." The cant of Puritanism is no doubt often detestable, but we are by no means certain whether the artistic cant of the present day is not every whit as objectionable. The blatant manner in which the apostles of culture congratulate themselves upon their ability to appreciate the beauty of realistic delineations of whatsoever things are unlovely or of evil report overshoots its mark and arouses in the minds of impartial observers a positive sympathy with Mrs. Grundy herself. Why in the name of all that is wholesome should the clerk, or the counter-jumper, or the gallery boy be abused like pickpockets because they fail to soar to that elevated plane of sentiment in which decency and domesticity are held up to scorn and ridicule? Why should they be sternly and solemnly rebuked for their insular ignorance in preferring "Tom Bowling" to some untranslatable French chanson? For our own part, and at the risk of incurring the condign displeasure of the hierophants of artistic veracity, we cannot help thinking this regard for decency and domesticity to be of the most cheerful augury for the music hall of the future. For these are precisely the qualities due regard for which is had in the café concerts in Germany, where you may see whole families of the despised middle class stratum, dining and spending their evenings rationally and pleasantly while listening to the excellent music discoursed by a first-rate band. And if, as we are assured by one so thoroughly well conversant with the variety stage as the writer in the National Observer, from whom we have quoted, decency and domesticity are so highly appreciated by the bulk of our music hall audiences, there is at least strong presumptive evidence that the time has come for the establishment of similar institutions in this country.

It will be said by some that we have already places of entertainment which come under this category, but on closer reflection it will be found that the parallel does not hold good. There are undoubtedly several restaurants in London, for example, at which bands play, but they are hardly within the reach, speaking financially, of the middle classes, and the music is executed, with rare exceptions, in a somewhat perfunctory manner. What we want are places of entertainment where a man could allow himself the luxury of taking his wife and his daughter, and amid an atmosphere of "decency and domesticity" give ear to good music. Simple as they seem, these conditions have never yet been simultaneously fulfilled at an English music hall. Men seldom take their wives, still more seldom their daughters. The atmosphere, if decent, is not exactly domestic; and though the bands are in some cases excellent, how rarely are they called upon to discourse good music! But as our critic is fain to admit, a ballad, though only indifferently performed, is always sure of a welcome. Now this fact, coupled with the bourgeois craving for "decency and domesticity," so far from being a source of dissatisfaction, positively inspires us with hope for the future of the music hall. If the great middle class public appreciate music apart from mummery, why not give them more of it at entertainments of this sort, and, above all, in larger doses? In our amusements as in our literature, we are the victims of the craze for brevity—for the snippet, the short story, the short paragraph, and the programme of half-a-hundred "turns." At any rate, the experiment is worth trying, and the wonder is that no enterprising manager has embarked upon it, if only as a commercial speculation. Hardly a month passes in which some indiscreet amateur does not venture all his available capital in a theatrical scheme foredoomed to failure by the indifferent quality of the play or the incompetence of the players whom he elects to finance. If people are so anxious to make ducks and drakes of their money, why not do so on a project which is at least intrinsically worthy of support? Music at the so-called music halls is relegated to an eminently menial condition. She plays Cinderella to her big and bouncing sister Terpsichore, and in the case of nine out of ten "turns" simply supplies a rhythmic basis to the performance. To extricate her from this servile plight is surely worth an effort, especially in view of the significant evidence furnished by those who complacently acquiesce in her oppression. Life, even in the middle classes, is often sordid enough, and why people should be taken to task for wishing to escape from its actualities in their entertainments is a problem which passes the wit of the plain person. And this being so, we cannot help thinking that the "music hall," in the true sense of the word, purged of the buffooneries and vulgarities of the variety entertainment, and keeping all that is wholesome and exhilarating in its fun, is much more likely to satisfy these legitimate aspirations than the style of entertainment at present in vogue.

FROM MY STUDY.

This month's triad of portraits includes a presentment of William Sterndale Bennett, one of the few Anglo-Saxon musicians who have reached up to real distinction and preserved their race from the reproach of latter-day barrenness. Mr. H. H. Statham, writing in Grove's Dictionary, proclaims him "the only English musical composer since Purcell who has attained a distinct style and individuality of his own, and whose works can be reckoned among the models or 'classics' of the art." Readers who have no more than a superficial knowledge of Bennett, and those who idly accept as truth the current chatter of ignorance, will probably be surprised to find a responsible writer claiming a distinct style and individuality for Bennett. The common belief is that his music is an echo of Mendelssohn, whereas the essential differences between the two masters are very considerable. Both spoke the musical language of their day, but each did so, to a large extent, in his own manner. Moreover, it is impossible to conceive the great gifts of Sterndale Bennett as belonging to a man destitute of an artistic individuality.

It was fitting that Bennett should be born in the most musical of English counties, but it does not appear that he came of a Yorkshire stock. I am unable to find a pedigree of this distinguished musician. In "Grove" it is simply stated that his grandfather John Bennett, was a lay clerk at Cambridge, where, inasmuch as he held office at King's, St. John's, and Trinity, it is probable that he was many years settled. Robert, the son of John, and father of William Sterndale, became an organist at Sheffield, where the greatest of the family was born. It would be interesting to know from what county these Bennetts sprang, and I am in hope of obtaining information on the point through some who may read these remarks. One point in the domestic history is certain—namely, that love of music and capacity for musical achievement were transmitted from father to son. It would appear, also, that the talent so handed down increased like money put out at compound interest. It qualified John to be a choirman; Robert to be an organist and composer of songs, and William Sterndale to take rank among the masters of his art. After reading Zola, it is well to find that which is beautiful subject to the laws of heredity no less than that which is ugly and monstrous.

Sterndale Bennett's years of pupilage at the Royal Academy of Music were, perhaps, the happiest of his life. Quite a child when he entered that Institution, he grew into a handsome lad, vivacious and spirited, yet modest and affectionate. One who knew him well as a very young man has told me that Bennett had only to show himself to win friends. He was the spoiled child of the Academy, and sustained the character appropriately by figuring in many boyish "scrapes." But he whom everybody loved, from servants to principal, found it easy to obtain pardon. Bennett kept through life the personal charm of his youth. Time put its mark upon him in many ways, but to the last something of the old boyish vivacity and love of fun would, under favouring circumstances, make a welcome appearance. I remember, on one occasion, dining with him and J. W. Davison at the house of a common friend. In the course of the meal, it became evident that the domestic barometer was not at "set fair," and an uncomfortable feeling prevailed. At length, after a decent time spent over the "wine and walnuts," Bennett was observed to be making signs which could only indicate the propriety of an early departure. Taking the hint, we retired. "Now, boys, come home with me," exclaimed our leader and instigator; we, nothing loth, following to the little house in St. John's Wood Road (now called Sterndale Cottage, and threatened, I understand, by a new railway) where, in the master's snug study, a few memorable hours were happily spent. Bennett was in his gayest mood and, easily led to be retrospective, told story after story with inimitable verve. Even Davison, who once, in my presence, took the conversational lead from Charles Dickens (the novelist had a fit of the sulks in consequence), even he was content to listen. The great characteristic of our composer, however, was his modesty. Duly estimating this, the many honours bestowed upon him seem to have a double value. We may be sure he did not intrigue for them, nor procure them by frequenting a back staircase. They came to him; he did not go to them. No man was less self-assertive. He never wished to be conspicuous in society or anywhere else. Men thus retiring sometimes pay a heavy price for indulgence of their taste, the world holding that if they do not care for it neither should it care for them. Bennett was of the higher order who can afford to do as they please. It is the notoriously wealthy man who need not shrink from little eccentricities of dress.

At the present time Bennett's music belongs to the few whose tastes are more or less akin to his own. The world delights in coarse and vulgar expression rather than in refined and delicate utterances. It loves the scene-painter's broad effects rather than the subtle touches of a Meissonier. In that respect the world is well provided, but something happily remains for the minority, and Sterndale Bennett helped to supply it. "He can hardly be reckoned," finely and justly says Mr. Statham, "with the great musical poets of the world, and it would be both unwise and uncritical to claim that place for him. But what he wanted in power is almost made up, in regard to the artistic enjoyment to be derived from his works, in individuality and in finish. He is in a special degree a musician's composer. His excellencies, in addition to the real and genuine feeling for beauty and expression which pervades his music, belong to that interesting and delicate type of art which illustrates in a special degree the fitness of means to an end, the relation between the feeling expressed and the manner and medium of expressing it; a class of artistic production which always has a peculiar interest for artists and for those who study critically the details of the art illustrated." While artists live, Sterndale Bennett's music will not die.

Keeping to friends and intimates of Mendelssohn, a portrait of Niels W. Gade is next presented. As in these papers I am not writing biographies, it does not come within my scope to tell of the many struggles and hard ways through which this musical son of old Denmark reached the eminence which was his when Death summoned him to higher work and nobler destinies. Else should I have to tell of early strivings amid circumstances not the most propitious, and of early progress made in virtue of talent backed by unflagging industry. This story has often been related, together with that of an ultimate success now acknowledged by all the world. My acquaintance with Gade was slight, but the circumstances are stored in my memory. During one of his visits to London, Gade accepted the hospitality of one of my friends, at whose house I met him as often as possible. The deepest impression made by contact with his personality resulted from what appeared to me extraordinary simplicity and naturalness. His epitaph might be "In art a man, simplicity a child." He could rarely be enticed to talk about himself or his doings, but he had much to say of those who had befriended him when kind words and acts were precious. He seemed to look out on the world not as a field to be exploited so much as one in which he found objects of delightful contemplation. I have seen him, for example, walking the garden, beaming like a pleased child upon the trees and flowers. Mr. Dannreuther speaks of his "amiable musical physiognomy" and of the "gentle repose" of his themes. These qualities corresponded with his nature. Gade, in point of fact, was one of those mild, contemplative, and half-dreamy beings often met with in Northern Europe—a product of race and temperament as affected by climate and physical surroundings. Emphatically a son of the "dark and true and tender" North, its characteristics appear in his music. Mendelssohn, intensely perceptive and receptive, carried back to Germany from the wild Hebrides a mental picture of blowing winds and sounding shores, of melancholy sea-scapes and rugged rocks, reproduced for all time in the "Isles of Fingal" Overture. Gade was born into possession of northern scenes, and, when his individuality asserted itself most strongly, he opened to us the lands of Ossian and the Highlands. But, like Mendelssohn, he revealed the underlying beauty rather than the superficial aspect. Berlioz would have drawn lurid and stormy pictures; his tempests would have howled and his waves thrown themselves with loud cries upon the rocks. Gade heard the inner voices of such scenes, and reproduced the impressions formed by their subtle communications. In that capacity lay his greatest service—his most precious contribution to the varied beauties and meanings that form the treasures of musical art.

Ferdinand Hiller, composer, pianist, conductor, litterateur—able in all these capacities, supreme in none—has, like Bennett and Gade, come within the scope of my personal observation, both here and in Germany. My principal recollection of him is as a man of vast and varied accomplishments—a man who had seen much and turned every opportunity to good account. He had all the quickness, cleverness, and perseverance of the race to which he belonged, and he had studied "men and cities" throughout Europe. Active, energetic, ever to the fore; a prodigious worker, and constantly in touch with leading minds, Hiller lived a life which ultimately entitled him to be regarded as a "grand old man." I knew him only in his later years, and my personal contact with him was chiefly at times when he could unbend, and freely open to us stores of observation, together with a rich fund of humour none the worse for being dry. Taken en robe de chambre, he was a man of whose company one could not have too much. When en grande tenue he appeared as a somewhat different person, and could be as hard and biting, or as dignified and patronising, as any man who, lacking the influence of commanding genius, ever worked and wormed his way to a conspicuous position. Hiller was the last of the public improvisers, in this country, at any rate, for I take no account of feeble efforts made by poor little wonder-children. I forget exactly how many years have passed since Hiller gave pianoforte recitals in the Hanover Square Rooms, and made a feature of improvising upon themes chosen by himself or suggested by the audience. In that form of impromptu exercise he showed wonderful capacity, and it was both an astonishment and a delight to listen—an astonishment especially when, by way of winding up, he would combine the most incongruous subjects with extraordinary skill and power. Few of his compositions will live. Admirably made as they are; rich as they are in all that constitutes the form and trappings of music, they lack the supreme magic, the fire of inspiration which enters the soul from beyond.

The death of Mrs. Lyne-Stephens, who at one time was Mdlle. Pauline Duvernay, première danseuse at the Grand Opéra and our own Drury Lane, led to much searching of records for particulars concerning her artistic career. This was not without results, to which I now proceed to make my own contribution.

There is an interesting notice of Mdlle. Duvernay in M. Charles de Boigne's "Petits Mémoires de l'Opéra," published by the Libraire Nouvelle in 1857. According to this writer, she was an enfant de l'Opéra, and took her first lessons as a figurante in the training school connected with the great temple of lyric drama; her master being M. Barrez. It is very rarely, says M. de Boigne, that a figurante becomes a premièr sujet, but the Duvernay was an exception to the rule. From the class of M. Barrez she rose to that of Vestris, whom, however, she left for Taglioni as soon as that professor's incomparable daughter showed what could be done under his teaching. Vestris, it appears, was deeply humiliated by this conduct on the part of his favourite and most promising pupil. "To see his Duvernay, the flower and glory of his class, carried off by an obscure person, a foreigner, a sauteur! What pain! what humiliation! Already Mdlle. Duvernay justified more than brilliant hopes. People spoke of her; they found her pretty; they quoted her sayings: the sayings of a danseuse! rara avis! M. de Boigne supplies an example of her mots, from which it would appear that they were sometimes acrid: "Some one, in her presence, praised a singer who had just appeared—as he had no talent it was very natural to praise him. 'What a fresh voice!' said one. 'Large compass!' said another. 'Sure!' (sûre) exclaimed a third, 'is it not so, Duvernay?' 'Oh, yes,' she answered, 'very sour (sure)—sour as vinegar.'"

The preferment of Mdlle. Duvernay to the rank of a "star" was the act of Véron, who, on becoming director of the Opéra and passing in review his feminine cohorts, was struck with the grace and beauty, as well as skill, of the young dancer. For her he caused to be prepared a ballet styled "La Tentation," music by Halévy. The production of this (June 21, 1832) was a triumph for the Duvernay, who suddenly found herself the talk of Paris. Whether the situation bewildered her may be in doubt, but, according to M. de Boigne, she suddenly disappeared from her mother's house. Of course this strange step gave rise to various conjectures. The fears of some pointed to the Morgue, but the form of the dancer was not seen on the marble slabs of that gruesome establishment. Others talked of an elopement, but the police said that nobody eloped from Paris without their permission. At length, a M. Gide received a little note containing the key of the mystery. That gentleman took a cab, drove to the address given, and found himself at the gate of a convent, passing which he saw the fair dancer walking with a nun. "Without exactly knowing why," says M. de Boigne, "she had run to prostrate herself before the altar, and had obtained the favour of admission to the convent. But soon, doubtless, an ascetic life became distasteful. She regretted the Opéra, and wished to return to the world she once believed herself to detest." Again on the stage, Mdlle. Duvernay became the pet of the public, and especially of the gallants, old and young, who regard a woman in her position as their natural prey. For these, however, she was altogether too much. Our author mentions particularly two cases in which she triumphed. To an old gentleman who persecuted her with attentions she said: "You love me, but do you love me to the extent of 100,000 francs?" The next day, her ancient admirer called again, with a casket in his hand. On entering the room, she found him already assuming the airs of a possessor, with his feet resting upon the sofa. "My dear," said he, "you asked me yesterday if I loved you as much as 100,000 francs; here is my answer." Opening the casket he showed her that sum in gold. Duvernay was more than equal to the occasion: "My dear, will you oblige me by not soiling my sofa with your feet, and then take away all that old iron (ferraille). I was joking, my dear. Do you know a rondo in 'La Dame Blanche?'—

Chez les montagnards écossais
Elle ne se vend jamais.

Well, in the matter of hospitality, my heart is Scotch—everything that is most Scotch, my dear." The old gentleman retired with his ferraille. Hearing of this adventure, a young suitor, too poor to buy hospitality, was rash enough to entertain a hope of success. "I do not offer you gold," he pleaded; "it is my life, my life, that I should be happy to sacrifice." Duvernay answered laughingly: "You would give me your head, if I wished it, would you not? You men are all alike—you offer that which one cannot and would not take." "I swear—" "Don't swear. I will take you at your word." "Heavens! have I heard aright? For mercy's sake, go on!" "You desire it?" "I implore you." "Well, offer me one of your teeth; that in the middle." "I fly—I shall return." Return he did, with a handkerchief to his mouth and his tooth in a little box. "Ah, how unfortunate!" exclaimed the damsel. "I wanted the tooth from your lower jaw, and you have brought me one from the upper." That young man went away sorrowful, and soon after received his tooth by post.

Mdlle. Duvernay was not always thus insensible, and her marriage, according to M. de Boigne, came about in a singular way. It appears that, on the death of an English marchioness, her maid was solicited to enter the service of the popular danseuse. But this Abigail, having what the French writer calls a "conscience exagéré," declined the place, for reasons arising out of the Duvernay's connection with a wealthy Englishman. Always susceptible, Mdlle. Duvernay was bitterly mortified, and even worried herself into a serious illness. On learning the cause her English friend said: "Make haste and get well, for to-morrow our banns shall be published at the Mairie, and in fifteen days we will be married." M. de Boigne tersely adds: "Proof that an English lady's-maid can be good for something." According to this authority the gentleman who robbed the Parisian stage of the enchanting dancer was worth £90,000 a year. M. de Boigne remarks, in conclusion: "In 1836 she retired from the opera. That was a sacrifice that the heart only can know, and that all the guineas in England cannot recompense. Nobody renounces without pain that life of emotions and triumphs. For those who have tasted the fascinations of the theatre family joys are poor and pale. Who knows if, before becoming accustomed to her new rôle, Mdlle. Duvernay did not, more than once, regret the rôle of Miranda.'" But the ex-dancer lived a long life in happiness as an English Lady Bountiful, and died almost in the odour of sanctity. X.

RADINO.

There lies in the Royal Library at Brussels a small ancient book, entitled "Il Primo Libro d'intavolatura di Balli d'Arpicordo, di Gio. Maria Radino, organista in S. Gio. di Verdara, in Padova. Nuovamente Composti, e con ogni diligenza Stampati. In Venezia, Appresso Giacomo Vincenti. MDXCII."

Oddly enough, this early work has been either entirely overlooked by musical antiquaries or wrongly catalogued. The industrious Becker could never have met with it, for in his tolerably comprehensive catalogue of those works for keyed instruments that were printed during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, it is not to be found Nor does Eitner make use of it in the capital collection of dance tunes of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, which he edited in 1875 for the "Gesellschaft für Musikforschung." Ambros in his history leaves it unmentioned, and the dictionary edited by Sir George Grove contains no reference to its author. Fétis, to be sure, knew of the book—possessed it even, for this identical copy seems to have passed to the Royal Library from his own—and his "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens" gives accordingly a short paragraph on Radino, in which is reproduced just as much information as the title-page above-quoted affords. But he attempts no criticism of the music, nor even a statement as to its character; and in the printed catalogue of his musical library it is mistakenly placed in class "Viole et Violon" of instrumental works, and not in its true position as music for "Clavecin et Piano." This latter class makes a chronological start with the English "Parthenia," published probably in 1611.

It may be well, therefore, to say what this modest but significant little book actually is—both on the face of it and beneath the surface. It is a set of pieces, as the title tells, written for the harpsichord in dance measures, by Giovanni Maria Radino, and printed by Vincenti in Venice in the year 1592. It is oblong quarto in size, and is a plain enough little publication, printed from type—not engraved. It consists of forty-nine pages (each of two double staves), which contain eight tunes—lessons, in old parlance. These are called "Pass' e mezo," "Gagliarda del ditto Pass' e mezo," "Padoana Pr.," "Padoana Seconda," "Gagliardo Prima," "Gagliardo Seconda," "Gagliardo Terza," "Gagliardo Quarta." Several of these are broken up into two or more sections.

Of the notation that is described in the title as "intavolatura" something must be said. The word in English, "tablature," is now generally understood only as signifying those hieroglyphs—to the modern eye—from which a lute-player of old played his part. But it had originally a wider sense. This has been variously defined (see Castellani's "La Stampa in Venezia," &c.), but generally with limitations that did not exist. "Tablature" in old days was applied to any system of notation whatever, by which a musical composition of more than one part was set down or "pricked" (prick-song). Early part-music for voices or instruments was never scored; the parts were written out separately for each voice or instrument, and often in separate books. But certain instruments there were, capable of playing several parts at once—of making harmony. These were the organ, regal, harpsichord, virginal, clavichord, and, of course, the lute, chitaronne, chitarra, theorbo; and music for all of these was written note above note, to express the simultaneous sounds they were intended to produce. Music for them was set down perpendicularly, so to speak, and this music it is that is spoken of as being "in tablature." May not the Latin root of the word, tabula (a board, table), help to elucidate the old sense of the term, as of some design laid out completely, set forth comprehensively to view, as on a table?* For "tablature" music showed the composition complete at a glance.

At all events, when examining the subject, we find the word applied over and over again to music for instruments that could emit more than one sound at a time, and which required to be written in short score. The methods for doing this were various, and tablature, therefore, was of various kinds.

That kind in early use by the Italians, the Germans, and the English, for the organ, harpsichord, or virginal, was practically our present pianoforte notation, and consisted of signs that had been long in use for the voice; these were set upon an increased number of lines (representing the scale), which were doubled for the requirements of two hands. This scheme seems simple enough, since we are familiar with it; but the tablature used by Ammerbach in his "Orgel oder Instrument Tabulatur," printed in Leipzig, 1571, now looks curious in the extreme. It does not depend upon a ladder of lines, as do all the other systems. The page of music is laid out into checquers, or squares, and within these are the letters, set one above the other, which name the sounds signified; and above each is placed a sign of duration, as in the lute tablature. Again, the lute tablature itself was of several kinds. Both numbers and letters were used for it—the first favoured by the Italians, the second by the English and other nations. These were set upon six lines, which represented the six principal strings of the instrument; the letters or numbers themselves referred to the frets, by means of which each string was shortened or "stopped" to produce the note.

The tablature then, in which this little book of Radino's is written, is of that ordinary kind which obtained generally in Italy and England by the middle of the sixteenth century for the harpsichord, and which has descended to us. The many variations, both in size of stave and of clef peculiar to the period, we need not go into here. This example is written upon a double stave, the lower consisting of eight lines (bearing both the C and F clefs) and the upper of five lines (with the G clef on the second line), which brings it very close to our modern form.

Of this little work we find some faint trace in the literature of its own day. Giacomo Vincenti, Radino's publisher, found it expedient, in the year 1619, to print a catalogue of his numerous publications, which is fortunately extant. It gives us some idea of the thriving state of music in Venice at that time. Here is music of all sorts—for voices, for viols, for lutes, for organs; solo music, and music in any number of parts; music accompanied and unaccompanied. And Vincenti was not the only music printer of his day in Venice; there were Gardano, Amadino, and many others. Ever since the revival of learning the printing presses of Venice had been active, and justly celebrated. The lovely editions of classic authors that emanated from them are precious to this day; and the printing of music had early commanded the attention of the printers. In 1498 the Venetian Senate granted to Petrucci da Fossombrone a patent (which, however, did not secure him against imitators) for his improved method of music printing, which included "Intaboladure d' Organo et de Liuto." So that this catalogue, full as it is, represents but a fraction of the music printed in Venice at the beginning of the seventeenth century.

The catalogue is divided into no less than twenty-three classes. Yet none of these appertains to harpsichord music. No. 20 is "Intavolature di Organo," No. 21 is "Intavolature di liuto, chitaron, e citara," No. 23 is "Musicke per cantar e sonar nel chitarone, tiorbe, arpicordo e altro simile stromento"—a class that applied to music that was sung with an accompaniment of these instruments, and which therefore could not include Radino's compositions. Strangely enough, his book is not set in the list of organ music to which, from its keyboard characteristics, it is most allied, but stands in the small set of fourteen that make up class 21; and is there even described as, "11. Intavolatura di liuto del Radino"! This seems, at first sight, almost as mistaken as its classification as viol music in Fétis's catalogue. But one justification may be found within the book's own pages. Though the title runs emphatically clear: "The first book in tablature of dances for the harpsichord by Radino," the author recommends his music, in his dedication, as suitable for two kinds of instruments: the gravicembalo or harpsichord and the lute: "Serviranno a due sorti di Stromenti, Gravecembalo e Liuto."

This brings us to an interesting point—namely, the confusion and interchangeability amongst the instruments of old times, before music had become specialised to suit their various capabilities. The reputation of the lute had been, in a still earlier time than this, enormous. It may possibly have been pushed too far; and the very fact that more and more was demanded of the instrument as keyboard music developed, may have assisted at its ultimate decline in favour. It and its fellows certainly could, as far as compass was concerned, vie with the regal and the virginal. The six fretted catgut strings alone yielded a scale of three and a half octaves, while a number of others were ready for additional use. The chitaron, or arch-lute, was over five feet in length, and possessed as many as twenty wire strings, while the smaller citara had about fourteen, also of wire. Yet even with this extensive scale at command it is hard to believe that a player who had both to stop and pluck the strings for the production of the notes, could readily play music written for a keyboard. In considering this problem, clear-headed old Ammerbach comes to our aid. In his pertinent preface to the instruction and music book already referred to, he himself compares these two classes of instruments, while he associates them together. He says: "Es ist auch die Orgelkunst andern vorzuziehen nicht allein derhalten das sie mehr denn auff einerley Instrumenten kan gebraucht werden (Denn wer dieser Kunst recht bericht kan dieselbe auff Positiven, Regaln, Virginaln, Clavicordijs, Clavicimbalis, Harficordijs u. andern dergleichen Instrumenten auch gebrachen) Sondern auch darumb das die Harmonia eines jeden Gesangs ganz volkommen u. unzerstummelt auff die Orgel u. andern jetzermetten Instrumenten geschlagen wird welches auff Lauten oder andern Instrumenten da viel Stimmen zugleich auff geschlagen werden fugliches weise allzeit sonderlich wenn dieselben mit Coloraturen oder Leufftlin gezieret werden sollen nicht geschehen kan."

This signifies, shortly put, that while upon instruments of the lute class several voice parts or the harmony of a song might be struck simultaneously, yet this harmony could be more conveniently rendered upon the keyboard instruments (organs, virginals, &c.). And further, that when the song is ornamented with divisions and little runs it could not be played upon the lutes at all.

This is clear, and to the point. So that already in the middle of the sixteenth century, and even earlier, when writers for the organ and virginal were ornamenting their compositions with all sorts of grace-notes readily produced by keys, the two classes of instruments so long associated (being alike capable of sounding chords, and alike provided for by "tablature") had begun to part company. And we may doubt if Radino had ever himself attempted to play his compositions on a lute, though he stated that "they could be so played," for he was, being an organist, a keyboard performer by profession.

But it seemed as if neither lute nor harpsichord music throve in the period immediately after the date of Radino's publication. The one was actually dying out; the other clearly suffered some sort of check in its development, as it did contemporaneously in England, after the death of Bull and Gibbons. For the fresh edition of Vincenti's catalogue, which was issued in 1649, still makes no provision for harpsichord compositions; and while most classes are largely extended, the lute class is as small as ever. The firm had printed nothing new for lute or harpsichord in thirty years, and Radino's book still stands as No. 11 in the list of 14, with an appended statement that it might be bought for two lire.

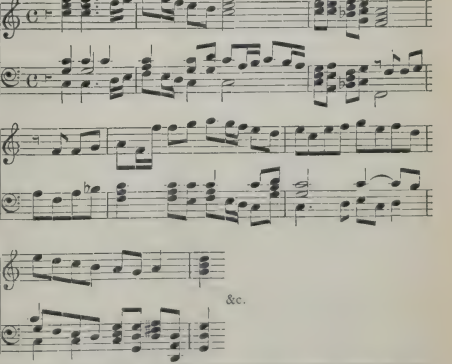
As to the artistic value of this music, there will probably be some difference of opinion. There is virginal music in manuscript, both in the British Museum and the Fitzwilliam Library, certainly antecedent to this,* and which is at least as artful and intricate. The music of "Parthenia," though it did not appear until more than ten years later—being engraved by Hole at the instigation of Mistress Dorothy Evans in the first years of the seventeenth century—was no doubt much of it already composed when Radino's book was printed, and it is far more advanced in style. To play a Galiardo by old Byrd, after one of these by Radino, is to receive the impression that the Englishman was the greater master of his art and the more learned musician of the two; though about Radino's music there is, in spite of crudities, a softer cast and a clearer definition of tonality, which give it a more gracious sound to modern ears.

But whatever its status in art, this little book acquires interest and importance in being, so far as we know—what "Parthenia" claimed to be—the first book ever printed specially for virginal music. It has, therefore, historic importance, and is of not the less interest if it should prove by comparison the superiority of English virginal compositions of the period. In the future day, when all early keyboard music shall be collected, sifted, placed in chronological order, and together criticised in a comprehensive work on the subject, this little work of Radino's, so long overlooked, will have some use and place. The final word upon it may then be spoken: it is at least now known to exist.

M. L. A.

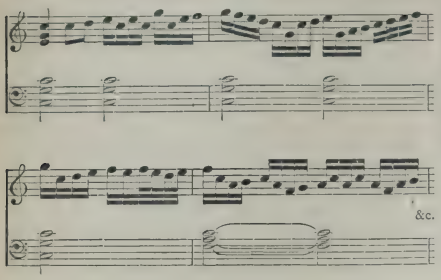
We subjoin a brief analysis of the contents of this interesting little volume. In the examples the time-values of the notes are half those of the original. It will be seen that the barring is very inaccurate, as was frequently the case in those days.

Page 1 begins thus quaintly:—



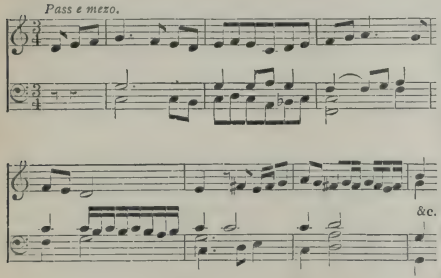
* In a MS. written early in Henry VIII.'s time, which has been extracted from by the Plain-Song Society for their publication, "Songs and Madrigals of the Fifteenth Century," some dance tunes for the virginal are to be found. One of these, "A Hornpipe," by Hugh Aston, though inferior to Radino in harmony and modulation, shows quite as much ingenuity in running scales and grace notes.

About twenty-five bars of imitative passages in three parts follow, and then the music changes character, becoming homophonic, in this style:



This sort of thing continues for a dozen bars or so, and then the florid passages are transferred to the left hand while the right plays the chords. About eighteen bars later the imitative passages (again mostly in three parts) are resumed, though on different subjects, and when these have been developed for thirty bars or so, the piece ends with a common chord of C in six parts.

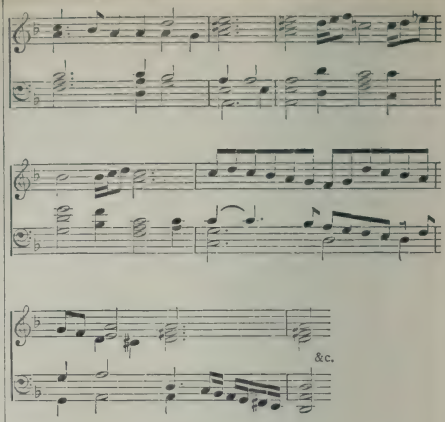
The second piece opens as follows:



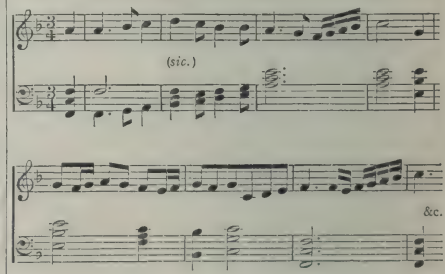
and, like its predecessor, contains florid passages accompanied by simple chords. Both pieces are of about the same length, the first being of 108 and the second of 100 bars.

The two Pavans are respectively of seventy-seven and sixty-seven bars' length. The first begins:

The second, which is a really charming piece—by far the best in the book—opens as follows:



The four Galliards which end the volume are much shorter than the former pieces and have also less musical interest. The first, in C, has but eighteen bars; the second, in G minor, has thirty-two; the third, in D minor, contains twenty-six; and in the last, which is melodically the best, there are thirty-one. The opening phrase runs thus:



Considerable use is made of the semiquaver figure as the piece progresses, and it is brought to a conclusion, in the key of D minor, with this cadence:

NEW LIGHTS UPON OLD TUNES.—

"The Arethusa."

It is certainly to be expected that a great nation like England, which has done much of her fighting on the high seas, should have a goodly store of sea songs. This, indeed, we have.

Ships have changed from wood to iron, and every detail of the Service been altered; yet, in default of better, the songs of Charles Dibdin and the other scattered naval and patriotic lyrics of the last century will touch the same chord as they did when originally written, and will find as quick a response. Amid the vast mass of rubbish which flowed from Dibdin's pen there sparkle gems which have never been surpassed, and we can afford to forget his Jew songs, his stage Irish, and his utterly false Yorkshire songs in remembering his "Ben Backstay," "The Token," "Blow high, blow low," and others of even greater merit.

Dibdin did not, however, monopolise the best naval song-writing of his time; there are many other songs of this period which will rank alongside the best of Dibdin's—from David Garrick's "Hearts of Oak" down to Allan Cunningham's "A wet sheet and a flowing sea," and among this number the vigorous song "The Arethusa" holds a prominent place.

"The Arethusa" appeared originally in a small opera, or musical entertainment, entitled "The Lock and Key," which was acted in 1796. The libretto was by Prince Hoare, author also of the popular opera "No Song, no Supper," and a water-colour painter of ability. He died in 1834.

Prince Hoare was, presumably, author of the words of the song, but the fine and spirited air is in all modern collections put down as the composition of William Shield. This error I wish in the following paper to dispel. First, however, as to the song itself. It exactly chronicles an engagement which took place in the English Channel on the evening of June 17, 1778. The Arethusa was commanded by Captain Marshall, and the following extract from Admiral Keppel's dispatch will show how closely the song narrates the incident:

"The Arethusa had come up with her chase on the evening of the 17th; she proved a large French frigate with heavy metal (the Belle Poule). Captain Marshall requested of the French captain to bring to, and informed him he had orders to conduct him to his admiral, who wished to speak to him, both of which requests the French officer peremptorily refused to comply with. Captain Marshall then fired a shot across the frigate, upon which the French captain instantaneously fired his whole broadside into the Arethusa, who was at that time very close alongside, which brought on an action on both sides, which continued for upwards of two hours. . . . The French ship's head being in with the land, and getting her foresail set, she stood into a small bay, where boats at daylight came out and towed her into safety," &c.

A few days later, for some supposed unpatriotic conduct in allowing certain French vessels to escape, Admiral Keppel was tried by court martial.*

The song, from the time of its production in "The Lock and Key" down to our own day, has, with a certain class of singers, never waned in its popularity. Charles Incledon's singing of it gave it great impetus in its first day. William Shield wrote and arranged the musical portion of "The Lock and Key," and this is the reason why Shield's name has ever been associated with the air. During Shield's lifetime, however, I am unaware that he ever claimed the composition of the melody; on the contrary, on the music folio sheets, contemporary with the production of the opera, it is always stated to be "arranged" or "adapted" by Mr. Shield. Dr. Kitchiner, in his "Sea Songs," 1823, prints Shield's name to the air, but his work contains other inaccuracies.

As a matter of fact, the air is really a dance tune named the "Princess Royal"; and this again has been, I believe wrongly, attributed to an Irish origin as the composition of Carolan, the Irish bard. Edward Bunting, in his "Ancient Music of Ireland," 1840, was the first to print this statement; he gives no proof, however, merely saying in his index that he noted the air down from Arthur O'Niell; and in another note that Carolan composed it for the daughter of Macdermott Roe. This information, possibly, was supplied by Arthur O'Niell, but it is by no means certain that it is correct. Carolan, like other musicians, was in the habit of playing other people's compositions as well as his own, and also enriching them with impromptu variations; and it will therefore be easily understood how such a mistake as the wrong attribution of the authorship of a melody might arise. "Bumper Squire Jones" is another instance in point, the air being always assigned to Carolan; but an examination of an early tune, called the "Rummer," in Playford's "Dancing Master" (1690), will show that it is highly improbable that he was the composer of it.

In some of the music books published at the end of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth century there is an air called "The Princess Royal," and this was, no doubt, named by some courtly musician or dancing master in honour of Sophia Dorothea, the unfortunate daughter of George I., who, born in 1684, married the brutal Frederick William, afterwards King of Prussia. This air has, however, nothing in common with the one we are dealing with; but in later years, probably about 1727 to 1730, it gave place to another tune named "The Princess Royal, the new way," and this is the air that has been in turn ascribed to Shield and to Carolan. The

* The firing of the broadside by La Belle Poule was a breach of an armistice and hostilities between the two nations recommenced. John O'Keefe, the celebrated opera writer, in his "Memoirs," tells how, after the Arethusa had come into port a few hours after the engagement, he went aboard her. He gives a very vivid picture of the frightful carnage he saw.

Princess Royal it was named after was most likely Princess Anne, the daughter of George II., born in 1709.

I have found the tune in three collections of this period, the first being a volume of Walsh's "Compleat Country Dancing Master," circa 1730, as under:—

"PRINCESS ROYAL, THE NEW WAY."

(From Walsh's "Compleat Country Dancing Master," circa 1730.)

A comparison of the air will at once show that Shield had the good sense to refrain from tampering with so fine a melody when he used it for "The Arethusa."

Another copy of the tune is found a little later in Wright's "Compleat Collection of Celebrated Country Dances both old and new," Vol. I., oblong 8vo. Here it is entitled "New Princess Royal," and is identical with the above.

Daniel Wright, the original compiler of the above work, was a music publisher, who, at the commencement of the last century, published many curious books of airs frequently with quaint and humorous titles. He also published, about 1735, a "Compleat Tutor for ye Flute," and in this the "Princess Royal" again appears, merely transposed to a higher key with the title the "new way" omitted, thus showing that the new air had fully ousted the old air out of public favour.

Strangely enough, the tune after this date seems to have gone out of favour, and it is not until 1787 that it re-appears. About this date it is with some slight variations printed in Alexander McGlashan's "Collection of Scots Measures, Hornpipes, Jigs, Allemands, and Cotillions" (Edinburgh, oblong folio). Perhaps it was seeing it in this work which induced William Shield to use it for "The Lock and Key" in 1796. Niel Gow, after 1802, next published the "Princess Royal" (the same set as McGlashan's) in part second of his "Complete Repository of Original Scots Tunes," folio; and after this date, with the exception of the copy in Bunting's Irish airs (1840), the old title "Princess Royal" sank, and the air was only known as "The Arethusa."

In several song books, issued about 1808 to 1810, in which "The Arethusa" is printed, florid additions are given to the air, but the following, from an early music sheet, appears to be the original form:—

"THE ARETHUSA."

Adapted by Mr. Shield. Sung by Mr. Incledon.

(From a Music Folio, circa 1800.)

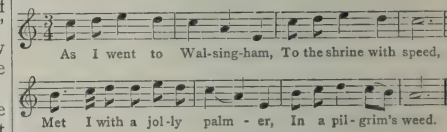
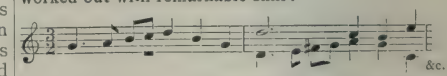
The first and second parts (twenty-four pages each) have now been issued of Messrs. Fuller Maitland and Barclay Squire's edition of the Fitzwilliam MS., wrongly known as "Queen Elizabeth's Virginal Book." The first piece consists of thirty variations by John Bull on the theme of the old English song "Walsingham," which is thus given in Chappell's collection:—



Among the variations are some that would tax the skill of the glibbest of modern fingers. This piece occupies eighteen pages, and is followed by two Fantasias by John Munday, the first a brilliant example of the fugato style, the second a piece of "programme music," consisting of feeble attempts to depict "Faire Wether," "Lightning," "Thunder," and "A cleare Day." No. 4 is a "Pavana," by Ferdinando Richardson; No. 5 is a variation of the same; a Galiarda and Variation by the same composer follow, and then we reach a fine "Fantasia" in G, by William Byrd, in which the following subject is worked out with remarkable skill:—



No. 9 is a set of Variations by Thomas Morley, on "Goe from my Window," and No. 10, a set by William Byrd, on "John, come kisse me now." Two pages only of the last-named are given, the limit of Part 2 being reached. The third instalment of this interesting publication will contain pieces by Morley, Munday, and Bull.

The Fitzwilliam Virginal book contains nearly 300 pieces by about thirty composers of the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. It is therefore obvious that its publication will supply sufficient evidence of the state of solo instrumental music at that epoch to permit of safer generalisations than it has hitherto been possible for the conscientious student to arrive at on this subject. In this connection we may remind those who are interested in the early history of chamber music for solo instruments that for a few shillings they may obtain nearly 200 examples—mostly, but not all, dance pieces—of sixteenth and seventeenth century lute music. These pieces, the work of thirty or more Italian composers, have been collected and translated into modern notation by Dr. Oscar Chilesotti, and published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel in two volumes, entitled respectively "Da un Codice Lauten-Buch del Cinquecento" and "Lautenspieler des XVI. Jahrhunderts." The pieces in the second of these range from 1536 (Hans Newsidler) to 1650 (Bernardello).

An ancient philosopher once observed that the face of the earth was changed on the day that the wheel was invented, and certainly the dominion of that mode of locomotion was never more paramount—indeed,one might say tyrannical—than at the present day. A young and uncultured athlete is reported to have asked whether the Wagner cycle was a good roadster, and then, of course, there is the story of the young lady, who, when asked if she was interested in the Psychical Society, replied that her brother sometimes let her go out on his machine. With regard to music, however, apart from the equivocal use of the term cycle, the connection between velocipedism and harmony is, undoubtedly, on the road to becoming more intimate, though whether this is a good thing for music is quite another matter. Cycling clubs have long had their buglers, but now we read in a French contemporary of the establishment of a society called the Fanfare Cycle, forty in number, all of whom, when taking their rides abroad, perform simultaneously on the cornet. Quite recently, on returning from a long excursion in the country, they dashed through a sleepy little village before the inhabitants had time to realise the nature of the visitation, and in consequence are said to have mistaken the electrifying sound of the forty cornets for the momentous blast of the last trump. We cannot say that the prospect of the importation of the cycling cornet player fills us with rapture, especially as he is, in all probability, only the precursor of the cycling organ grinder. Within certain limits, however, the system might have its advantages. For example, we can well imagine that the weary record-breaker, condemned by the perverse spirit of emulation to his dreary twenty-four-hour task, might from time to time stimulate his jaded limbs to fresh activity by turning on a tune on his own machine. But we trust that at all hazards our country lanes, already desecrated by so much that affronts the eye in the way of pill boards, may be spared the further auricular atrocity of the cornet-playing cyclist.
